

AN EXHIBITION IN THREE OBJECTS

Porcelain in Translation

One porcelain tradition.
Three worlds.

01 The Chinese past

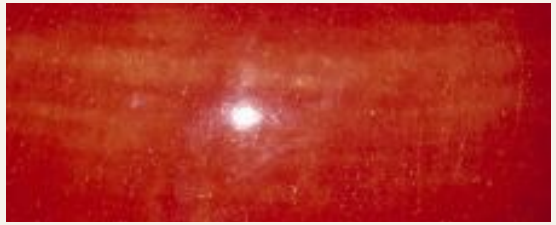

02 The Qing court

03 European markets

Reviving copper-red

Jingdezhen potters recovered Ming copper-red glazing.

An inherited technique became a statement of Qing identity.

Copper-red glaze | detail

Langyao-red Guanyin vase

Kangxi reign, 1662–1722 · Palace Museum

Swallows
in enamel

Imperial falangcai “swallows” bowl

Enamels at the Qing court

Qianlong reign, 1736–1795

European enamel knowledge met Chinese porcelain and bird-and-flower painting.

Beijing court workshops selected and adapted these techniques for imperial taste.

JINGDEZHEN → BEIJING

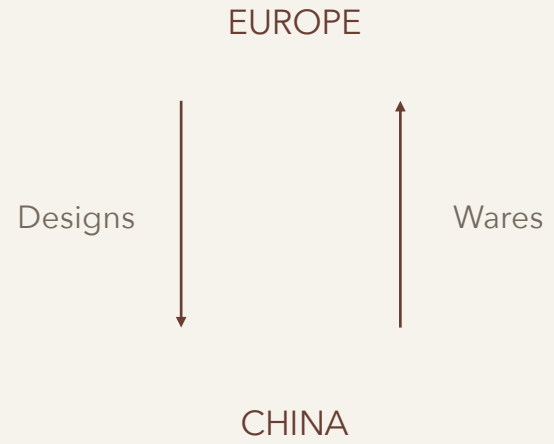

A coat of arms, made in China.

Chinese armorial export plate · eighteenth century

Heraldry | detail

European patrons sent heraldic designs to China. Chinese artisans made porcelain for family identity and social status.

Chinese production, European family identity.

Porcelain changes meaning.

Tradition, court workshops and overseas patrons each shaped the object.

Tradition

Court taste

Status

Conceptual connections

Qing makers actively shaped cultural exchange.