This article argues that the concern with monument destruction in warfare is as old as the world's earliest historical texts and monuments, upon which were inscriptions warning of their potential destruction and removal as acts of war. Here, I point out that this remarkable historical evidence, known from the monuments and texts that survive from antiquity, is from the lands currently known as Iraq and Syria. When this paper was written and first delivered at the Fitch Colloquium for historic preservation in 2016, that history was in the process of being systematically obliterated by ISIS. In some cases, such as that of Palmyra, the wisdom of UNESCO's hasty declaration that it would immediately restore the site upon ousting ISIS was questioned by many. For this reason, the article focuses on both destruction and preservation as aspects of warfare, the aims of such destruction as well as the role and politics of preservation in these wars.

中文译文

本文认为，战争中对纪念物遭到毁坏的关注，与世界上最早的历史文献和纪念物一样古老；这些纪念物上的铭文已经对其可能因战争行为而被毁坏或迁移提出警告。在此，我指出，这些从留存至今的古代纪念物和文献中获得的非凡历史证据，出自今天被称为伊拉克和叙利亚的地区。2016年，本文写成并首次在菲奇历史保护研讨会（Fitch Colloquium）上宣读时，这段历史正遭受“伊斯兰国”（ISIS）的系统性抹除。在某些情况下，例如帕尔米拉（Palmyra），联合国教育、科学及文化组织（UNESCO）仓促宣布将在ISIS被驱逐后立即修复遗址，许多人质疑这一决定是否明智。因此，本文将毁坏与保护都视为战争的组成方面，考察此类毁坏的目的，以及在这些战争中保护工作的作用和政治问题。

المستخلص

تُجادِل هذه المقالة بأنَّ الاهتمام في تدمير الآثار في الحرب قَديمٌ بقِدَم نصوص العالم التاريخية وآثاره، وعَلَيه كانت هناك كتابات منقوشة تُحَذِّر من تدميرِها المُحتَمَل أو إزالتها كأعمال حرب. هُنا، أُشير بأنَّ هذا الدَليل التاريخي اللافِت للانتباه والذي عُرِفَ

Two thousand five hundred years before the beginning of the Christian era, a Sumerian monument was erected in the south of modern-day Iraq (Figure 26). The monument takes the form of a large stele, carved on both sides with relief images and inscribed with a lengthy text about border disputes and warfare. Although much attention has been given to various features of the stele, one small aspect of the ancient text that has not been given due attention or recognition is rather noteworthy. Among the oaths that were sworn to the gods at the end of the war and recorded on this stele are promises that the warring parties would neither destroy nor dislocate the monument.1 To date, this stele is the earliest known historical monument, and it tells us that already at that time, the deliberate destruction or removal of a monument from its site was to be taken as an act of war.

公元纪年开始前的两千五百年，即约公元前2500年，今天伊拉克南部竖立了一座苏美尔纪念物（图26）。这座纪念物是一块大型石碑，两面都刻有浮雕图像，并镌刻了一篇关于边界争端与战争的长篇文字。尽管人们对石碑的不同特征给予了大量关注，但这篇古代铭文中有一个尚未受到应有重视或承认的细节，尤其值得注意。战后向诸神宣誓、并记录在石碑上的誓言包括：交战各方保证既不毁坏也不移走这座纪念物。[1] 迄今为止，这块石碑是已知最早的历史纪念物；它告诉我们，当时人们已将蓄意毁坏纪念物或将其从原址移走视为一种战争行为。

In contemporary scholarship, we often hear or read that cultural preservation is a modern and Western concern, and that laws of war concerning what is now referred to as heritage are aspects of Western modernity alone, not recognized in earlier eras. This is not the case. Although I want to address the current genocidal violence in Iraq and Syria and the strategies of historical erasure that are part and parcel of it, I would first like to go back in time to ancient Mesopotamia. I present the evidence from antiquity not simply as a lesson in history but to make the case that human beings and monuments are entangled in their histories. Mesopotamia stands as an example of at least one well-recorded ancient culture where monuments were understood as having a vital agency of their own. This agency was not ascribed to them but inherent within their logic as monuments, and their destruction was seen as having direct effects on the people, the land, the king, and his reign.2

The attempt to eradicate the past of Syria and Iraq is aimed at the obliteration of this earliest Mesopotamian history, a history that the local populations consider to be their own heritage and a basis of their collective past, something that transcends religion and ethnicity.3 It is for this reason that historical monuments are now deliberately targeted; it is a strategy that aims to create a terra nullius, meaning a land that belongs to no one and has no prior historical claims, rendering it a no-man's land available for conquest. Thus the strategy of obliteration aims to create a land ready for the rewriting of history with a new vision, cleansed of its pre-Islamic past and cleansed also of any evidence of the thousands of years of existence of peoples and religions that do not suit the worldview of the ideology of Wahabism.4 To counter that obliteration of history and to demonstrate how people and edifices were closely linked, I will recount the earliest writings on the place of monuments found in discourses of just war and war crimes, and the significant textual and archaeological evidence for the ancient Mesopotamian concerns with architectural preservation and restoration.

中文译文

The ancient Mesopotamians who lived in what is now Iraq, Northeastern Syria, and Southeastern Turkey were probably the first people in the world to create inscribed historical monuments whose purpose was to endure into the distant future.5 We read in the ancient texts that their monuments were conceived of as site-specific works meant to be present for all time. Their inscriptions often address viewers who were to see the monument in the distant future.6 These works were made of various materials and in many forms, including free-standing steles or slabs of sculpted and inscribed stones, and relief sculptures carved into the cliffs of the mountainsides and set in magnificent works of architecture. Their materials, stone or brick, were considered to have inherent supernatural qualities. The monumental buildings were both religious and secular in nature. The ancient Mesopotamians also had a literature that praised these works as remarkable and astonishing things that future generations should admire, the first poetical descriptions of architecture we have. In these ancient texts, future generations were asked specifically to preserve these works. When monuments and architectural edifices were destroyed, when cities were ravaged by war, laments and requiems were written and sung on behalf of the destroyed built structures, just as they were for the people who had been killed, enslaved, and devastated. They were all considered aspects of the same destruction.7 These acts of war and discourses of war and its aftermath, were also defined as part of the ME, the early Sumerian list of concepts and things that are associated with civilization. The ME include the arts, music, sculpture, and all kinds of positive and creative things and activities. But they also include aspects of life that are negative, such as warfare. For the Mesopotamians, seeing war as part of the ME was a way of acknowledging that warfare is an inevitable aspect of civilization, and therefore rules of war were established.8

生活在今天伊拉克、叙利亚东北部和土耳其东南部的古代美索不达米亚人，可能是世界上最早创造带有铭文、并旨在留存至遥远未来的历史纪念物的人群。[5] 从古代文献中可以读到，他们将纪念物设想为与特定地点相联系、应当永久存在的作品。铭文常常直接面向遥远未来将看到这些纪念物的人。[6] 这些作品采用不同材料，形式也多种多样，包括独立矗立的石碑、带有雕刻和铭文的石板，以及刻在山体悬崖上或安置于宏伟建筑中的浮雕。石材或砖块等材料被认为本身具有超自然的属性。这些纪念性建筑既有宗教性质，也有世俗性质。古代美索不达米亚人还创作了赞颂这些作品的文学，将其描述为值得后世欣赏的卓越而惊人的事物；这些是我们目前所知最早的建筑诗性描写。在这些古代文本中，作者还明确要求后世保存这些作品。纪念物和建筑遭毁坏、城市遭战争蹂躏时，人们会为被毁的建筑结构撰写和吟唱哀歌与挽歌，就像为那些遭杀害、奴役和摧残的人们所做的一样。所有这些都被视为同一场毁灭的不同方面。[7] 战争行为，以及关于战争及其后果的论述，也被列入“ME”之中；ME是早期苏美尔人列举与文明相关的概念和事物的清单。其中有艺术、音乐、雕塑以及各种积极的、创造性的事物与活动，但也包含战争等生活中的消极方面。对美索不达米亚人而言，把战争视为ME的一部分，就是承认战争是文明不可避免的一个方面，因此他们制定了战争规则。[8]

英文原文

The Sumerians already practiced what we later call in Latin jus ad bellum, or ‘just war’. The act of war against another city-state was not acceptable unless it was defensive. The stele with which I began this article was erected by Eannatum of Lagash (modern Telloh in southern Iraq) and is the earliest known public, historical monument. It is a monument to victory, but at the same time it is also a contractual agreement, a peace treaty set up after the end of the battle between the city-states of Lagash and its neighbor Umma. Before the battle with Umma, Eannatum received the divine message in a dream oracle that sanctioned the war, and he justified his battle as a defense of the territory of Lagash. Already in the mid-third millennium BC the Sumerians practiced diplomacy. Before a war, envoys were sent to try to find a diplomatic solution for border conflicts. It was only when these failed that a messenger would be sent with a declaration of war, in advance of the actual attack. The taking of lives, even for the king and his military, was a source of great anxiety and required justification and sanction from the gods. Among the oaths that were made repeatedly were ones related to the protection of monuments themselves. Kings had to swear that they would not transgress borders, and also that they would not destroy monuments, so the destruction of monuments was already defined as an act of war in the third millennium BC. The destruction of a monument was considered legitimate reason to launch a just war, a war that was sanctioned by the gods. Throughout Mesopotamian history, monument destruction, or the theft and dislocation of monuments and statues, was often declared as the ostensible reason for launching a just war. As the stele of Eannatum makes clear, the destruction of a monument was seen as a criminal act, and it was tantamount to the breaking of a peace treaty.

中文译文

The opposite side of this anxiety over the destruction of monuments is the ancient concern with preservation and conservation of architecture and monuments. Extensive information about restoration and preservation of works of historical architecture also exists, especially in ritual texts. About two thousand years after the Sumerian stele of Eannatum was erected, texts still reveal that these concerns remained in full force. During the reconstruction of a building, the brick god required prayers. Instructions for architectural restoration dating to the Seleucid era (fourth through third centuries BC) say:

与这种对纪念物遭毁的忧虑相对应的另一面，是古代人对建筑和纪念物保存与维护的关切。关于历史建筑修复与保护的大量资料也留存了下来，尤其见于仪式文本。埃安纳图姆的苏美尔石碑竖立约两千年之后，文献仍显示这种关切十分强烈。重建建筑时，人们必须向砖神祈祷。塞琉古时期（公元前四至三世纪）的建筑修复指示写道：

> When the wall of a temple falls into ruin, in order to demolish and re-found that temple, the diviner shall investigate the site [for ancient remains]. The builder of the temple shall put on clean clothes and put a tin bracelet on his arm; he shall take an axe of lead, remove the first brick, and put it in restricted place. You set up an offering table in front of that brick god of the foundations, and you offer sacrifices.9

These instructions for a restoration ritual show that architectural rituals and preservation rites that had begun in Sumer in the early third millennium BC still existed in some form thousands of years later in the fourth century BC. The text orders the kalu priest10 to remove the first brick and place it on an altar. The kalu priest was then to sing the lamentations according to an age-old Mesopotamian tradition of laments and dirges sung for the destruction of cities and their architecture. These laments had been sung for the destruction of cities and for the terrible loss of temples and their magnificent sculptures during warfare as early as the late third millennium BC.11

In the Seleucid ritual quoted above, there was some sense that the original brick set upon the altar had to be appeased; it was the representative of the brick god, Kulla. Its removal from the original context of the building was played out as a temporary dislocation, while the repairs were being made as carefully as possible, following the original ground plans of the temple. When an ancient wall had to be pulled down and rebuilt, a process of mourning thus had to take place in order to bridge the gap between the existence of the old wall and the rebuilding of the new one. In another passage, the text also makes clear that the building site had to be surveyed by the baru (the seer priest), so that nothing would be inadvertently missed or damaged in the process of reconstruction.

在上文引用的塞琉古仪式中，置于祭坛上的那块原始砖似乎需要得到安抚；它是砖神库拉（Kulla）的代表。从建筑原有位置移走砖块，被演绎成一种临时迁移；与此同时，修复工作则尽可能谨慎地按照神庙原来的平面布局进行。当一面古墙必须拆除并重建时，就需要通过哀悼仪式，在旧墙的存在与新墙的重建之间建立衔接。文本的另一段也明确指出，建筑地点必须由巴鲁（baru，即先知祭司）勘察，以确保重建过程中不会无意中遗漏或损坏任何东西。

The ancient Mesopotamians were constantly concerned with the reverence and respect for the remains of the past, and Mesopotamia is the first place where we can study these acts of preservation from both textual and archaeological evidence. We can even say that the reverence for the past and the concern with preservation of their ancient cities was distinctive of Mesopotamia, and these concerns are at times similar to those of our own time.

A lengthy compendium of omens known as Šumma alu (If a city), after its opening line, shows the concern with preservation well. These are but a few lines from a long list of forms of restoration and preservation of things, from images of gods and heroes to entire buildings and more limited architectural repairs. The text even has a section of concerns for surveyors who are planning to build at a particular location, so that if a man plans to build a house, and, while digging the foundations, finds something in the ground, he must follow particular procedures for preservation. All ancient objects found in the ground or that remained standing in temples or public places were considered to belong to the terrain and its history; their preservation was propitious for the people of the land and their future.

Demolition and preservation / 拆除与保存

Despite repeated cycles of war and devastation throughout the millennia of ancient history, the antiquities of the land nevertheless survived in some form or another. When in the second century BC the governor of Lagash, Adad-nadin-ahhe (and his builders) found the statues of King Gudea who had set them up two thousand years earlier, the later ruler had them placed in his newly constructed palace. Not only did he collect them and set them up carefully for display, but he ordered his scholars and scribes (who were able to read ancient languages and scripts) to imitate the Sumerian methods of building and of writing inscriptions that he used in his own palace. They made inscriptions written in Aramaic and Greek in such a way that they looked like the bricks inscribed with Gudea's name written in ancient Sumerian.13 This was one of the earliest extant forms of antiquarian collecting and study of the past, and it prefigures the interests and activities that we see, for example, in the Italian Renaissance. These were ancient forms of preserving the past as a way to form ideological links to the antiquity of the land, but were also as pious acts, and in the pursuit and preservation of historical knowledge.

尽管古代历史的数千年间反复发生战争与毁坏，这片土地上的古物仍以这样或那样的形式保存下来。公元前二世纪，拉格什的统治者阿达德－纳丁－阿赫（Adad-nadin-ahhe）及其建筑工匠发现了国王古地亚（Gudea）于两千年前竖立的雕像；这位后来的统治者将雕像安置在自己新建的宫殿里。他不仅收集并精心陈列这些雕像，还命令能够阅读古代语言和文字的学者与书吏模仿苏美尔人的建筑方法和铭文书写方式，并将其用于自己的宫殿。他们用阿拉米语和希腊语撰写铭文，但让这些铭文看上去如同那些刻有古地亚名字、使用古苏美尔语书写的砖块。[13] 这是现存最早的古物收藏和研究过去的实践形式之一，也预示了后来例如意大利文艺复兴时期出现的相关兴趣与活动。这些都是保存过去的古老方式，既通过它们在意识形态上与这片土地悠久的古代历史建立联系，也是出于虔敬，以及追求并保存历史知识的目的。

I have covered this ancient historical information in some detail for several reasons. First, to point out that people and monuments are intertwined, and that this entanglement was recognized in the literature and rituals of antiquity. Second, preservation and conservation are not modern Western ideas – a claim that is often made today and is also now used to justify the demolition of historical sites. The historical evidence is to the contrary, and it is exactly this evidence that is being wiped out today. Along with the murder and displacement of the population, the aim of this violent erasure is the rewriting of history and the restructuring of the landscape for geopolitical goals.

中文译文

[P017]

Rather than following cultural preservation policies that highlight heritage primarily in relation to tourist sites or concepts of global cultural heritage, as well-meaning as these are, we must consider the aims of this current erasure that targets the local population and the local landscape. Groups such as ISIS claim that their destruction of pre-Islamic monuments and archaeological sites, Shiite and Yazidi shrines, as well as Christian churches and monasteries, are all justified acts of religious war, but their larger goals have clearly been territorial, including the murderous ethnic cleansing of the population in regions that they wish to rule.

中文译文

尽管以旅游景点或全球文化遗产观念为中心的文化保存政策出于善意，我们仍不能仅仅遵循这样的政策，而必须考虑当下这种以当地居民和当地地景为目标的抹除行为究竟意欲何为。ISIS等组织声称，毁坏伊斯兰教以前的纪念物和考古遗址、什叶派与雅兹迪派圣所，以及基督教教堂和修道院，都是正当的宗教战争行为；然而，它们更大的目标显然涉及领土，包括在其希望统治的地区对居民进行致命的族群清洗。

While it is clear today – as United Nations resolutions and international laws have acknowledged – that cultural destruction is an act of war, and even a war crime, which in August 2016 the International Criminal Court prosecuted in relation to the demolition of tombs in Timbuktu, this kind of prosecution has been somewhat selective. Many acts of direct targeting of heritage sites by UN member states that have taken place in recent years pass without much comment from the international community.

如今，正如联合国决议和国际法所承认的，文化毁坏显然是一种战争行为，甚至可能构成战争罪。2016年8月，国际刑事法院就廷巴克图墓葬遭拆毁一事进行了起诉。然而，这种起诉在一定程度上具有选择性。近年来，联合国会员国直接将遗产遗址作为攻击目标的许多行为，几乎没有引起国际社会的评论。

Furthermore, much of the work on preservation in war today is closely linked with government policies. Heritage is destroyed in war, ancient sites are occupied or deliberately attacked, but restoration is now also used as a declaration of victory, and it is also a means of profit for organizations that are awarded lucrative restoration and development contracts on political grounds. Governments and organizations compete for the control of the restoration of sites, as we saw was the case after the removal of ISIS from Palmyra in Syria.14 At the same time, many funding agencies in the United States and Western Europe appear to be more concerned with showcasing new digital technologies than with tangible material or historical monuments. Some of these initiatives appropriate the heritage of Syria and Iraq for their own marketing purposes and profit in disturbing ways. While one may expect some companies to prefer the production of polyurethane replicas to restoring antiquities because of their own interests and potential profits, there is now also an effort to impose these replicas upon the ancient sites themselves without regard for local views. This push for replicas has been aptly referred to as a new digital colonialism by some archaeologists.15 Interestingly, the policy of replicas placed on heritage sites is one that was traditionally rejected by UNESCO and by archaeological practices in general. One of the requirements for the inscription of a site as a UNESCO World Heritage site is its ‘authenticity’. A decade ago UNESCO rejected Iraq’s bid to place Babylon on the World Heritage list because the reconstructions of some of the walls on site were inauthentic. Ironically, replication on site, using modern synthetic materials and 3D printing techniques, is now being promoted by preservationists in the United States and Western Europe as the best course of action for the future of the sites in Iraq and Syria that have been destroyed in war (for example Figures 27 and 28).16

此外，当今战争中的许多保存工作与政府政策密切相关。遗产在战争中遭到毁坏，古代遗址被占领或蓄意攻击，但修复如今也被用来宣告胜利；因政治原因而获授利润丰厚的修复与开发合同的组织，也可从中牟利。各国政府和组织争夺遗址修复工作的控制权，正如我们在叙利亚帕尔米拉的ISIS被驱逐后看到的情形。[14] 与此同时，美国和西欧的许多资助机构似乎更关注展示新的数字技术，而非有形的物质遗存或历史纪念物。其中一些举措以令人不安的方式，将叙利亚和伊拉克的遗产据为己用，以服务自身的营销目的和利益。考虑到一些公司的自身利益及潜在利润，我们或许可以预料，它们宁愿生产聚氨酯复制品，也不愿修复古物；但如今人们甚至试图不顾当地意见，将这些复制品直接安置到古代遗址上。一些考古学家恰当地将这种推动复制品的做法称作一种新的“数字殖民主义”（digital colonialism）。[15] 值得注意的是，将复制品安置在遗产遗址的政策，传统上一直受到联合国教科文组织及一般考古实践的反对。遗址列入教科文组织《世界遗产名录》的要求之一是其“真实性”（authenticity）。十年前，联合国教科文组织拒绝伊拉克将巴比伦列入《世界遗产名录》的申请，理由是现场部分城墙的重建缺乏真实性。具有讽刺意味的是，如今美国和西欧的遗产保护者却在推动以现代合成材料和3D打印技术在原址制作复制品，认为这是伊拉克和叙利亚遭战争毁坏遗址未来的最佳选择（例如图27和图28）。[16]

Since 2003, war has devastated Iraq and Syria. As I write this essay, our people are being killed and displaced, they are enslaved and tortured, cities are demolished and much more. In many cases, it is clear that the attacks on monuments are part of the strategy to erase the local populations and their histories and to use culture as a means to divide and wipe out history and people alike. This aspect of the cultural destruction has had little attention in comparison to the idea that sites such as Palmyra in Syria or Nimrud in Iraq are World Heritage Sites that need to be rescued because they are the origins of Western history or Global Heritage. In this way, cultural heritage policy today dissociates the historical sites from both landscape and people.

In September 2016, the president of France, François Hollande, announced a $100 million dollar fund to protect cultural heritage, especially in Syria and Iraq.17 These funds (once they are raised) are to be allocated to postwar restoration, while part of Hollande's plan is to offer asylum in Europe to artifacts that are in danger. While this is no doubt an admirable pledge to protect culture, the reluctance to take in human refugees stands in marked contrast to the concern for heritage. The disconnection of Mesopotamian history from the landscape and the people of the Middle East is exactly what earlier scholarship of Orientalist and postcolonial criticism attempted to point out. In the nineteenth century, collections of antiquities in museums such as the Louvre and the British Museum often presented their acquisitions as a form of rescue and preservation from the ignorant populations unable to either understand or value the past.18 This renewed dissociation in much preservation policy is all the more surprising given that the reason for the ISIS attacks on heritage sites such as Nimrud, Nineveh, Palmyra, as well as religious shrines and sanctuaries of any undesirable religious group – from Christians to Sufis, Shi'ites and Yazidis – is the erasure of the presence and histories of the diversity of peoples in Iraq and Syria, and the rewriting of the local history in their own vision, cleansed of the lives and histories of others.

2016年9月，法国总统弗朗索瓦·奥朗德（François Hollande）宣布设立一项价值1亿美元的基金，用以保护文化遗产，特别是叙利亚和伊拉克的遗产。[17] 这些资金一旦募集到位，将用于战后修复；奥朗德计划的一部分还包括在欧洲为处于危险中的文物提供“庇护”。毫无疑问，这是一项值得称赞的文化保护承诺，但不愿接纳人类难民的态度，与对遗产的关切形成鲜明对比。美索不达米亚历史与中东的地景和人民相互分离，恰恰是早期东方主义和后殖民批判研究试图指出的问题。十九世纪，卢浮宫和大英博物馆等机构的古物收藏，往往将其获得文物的行为呈现为一种拯救和保存：仿佛文物是从那些既不能理解也不懂珍视过去的“无知”当地居民手中获救的。[18] 鉴于ISIS攻击尼姆鲁德、尼尼微、帕尔米拉等遗产遗址，以及从基督徒到苏菲派、什叶派和雅兹迪派等任何其所不容的宗教群体的神庙和圣所，目的正是抹除伊拉克和叙利亚各类人群的存在及其历史，并依照ISIS自身的愿景重写地方历史，清除其他人的生活与历史，因此，许多保存政策如今再次造成这样的分离，就更令人惊讶。

At Columbia University's Art History and Archaeology Department, we had already been immersed in a field project before the ISIS takeover of Mosul and the declaration of the caliphate there. The Mapping Mesopotamian Monuments topographical survey that I direct was not in fact formulated as a reaction to the ISIS attacks on historical monuments. I first envisaged this project in 2004 when I was working in Iraq, and the project was originally a response to the destruction of heritage that had resulted from the US and coalition invasion of Iraq in the 2003 war and the occupation that followed. After waiting for US troops officially to withdraw from Iraq, thus ending the US occupation of Iraq in 2011, I launched the field project in 2012, just after the occupation forces had left. Therefore, the project was not initiated with the current conflict in mind but as a response to the earlier US-led war. We began the Mapping Mesopotamian Monuments field survey in the north of Iraq, in Iraqi Kurdistan, and have to date covered the monuments, historical architecture, and rock reliefs in the provinces of Dohuk, Erbil, and Sulaymaniyah/ Slemani, as well as south-eastern Turkey. As ISIS took over Mosul after our work began, we postponed the documentation of the region of Mosul and the Nineveh province until a later date.

在ISIS占领摩苏尔并宣布在那里建立哈里发国之前，我们在哥伦比亚大学艺术史与考古学系就已投入一项实地项目。我主持的“美索不达米亚纪念物测绘”（Mapping Mesopotamian Monuments）地形调查，事实上并非针对ISIS攻击历史纪念物而设计。我于2004年在伊拉克工作时首次构想了这个项目。它最初是为了回应2003年战争中美国及其联军入侵伊拉克、以及随后的占领所造成的遗产毁坏。在等待美军于2011年正式撤出伊拉克、从而结束美国对伊拉克的占领后，我于2012年、即占领部队离开不久便启动了这一实地项目。因此，该项目并不是因当前的冲突而发起，而是为了回应更早之前由美国领导的战争。我们从伊拉克北部的伊拉克库尔德斯坦地区开始开展“美索不达米亚纪念物测绘”实地调查，迄今已覆盖杜胡克（Dohuk）、埃尔比勒（Erbil）和苏莱曼尼亚／斯莱马尼（Sulaymaniyah/Slemani）等省份的纪念物、历史建筑和岩石浮雕，以及土耳其东南部的相关遗存。由于我们开始工作后ISIS占领了摩苏尔，我们不得不推迟对摩苏尔地区和尼尼微省的记录工作，留待日后进行。

The project is a topographical survey of standing historical architecture and monuments from South Eastern Anatolia and Iraqi Kurdistan to southern Iraq. It covers all historical periods from ancient to modern, including Mesopotamian rock reliefs in the cliffs, early Christian monasteries and churches, early Islamic, Ottoman, and twentieth-century architecture. The Columbia survey covers all historical eras and types of monuments. The wide range of places, architectural structures, and standing monuments that we cover aims to record the rich diversity of this land and its history, a diversity that is being deliberately targeted and erased. The team I direct is formed of archaeologists from Columbia University as well as colleagues based in Iraq at the State Board of Antiquities and Heritage, both from Baghdad and from Iraqi Kurdistan. We work together onsite to map and document monuments and to assess their conditions. This information may be taken up for future preservation work. All of us on the team feel that our work is to create a historical record to counter deliberate erasure of our history. This kind of documentation can also be a source of evidence for future legal trials for war crimes and for any future demands for reparations for destruction.

这一项目是一项对从安纳托利亚东南部和伊拉克库尔德斯坦延伸至伊拉克南部的现存历史建筑与纪念物所进行的地形调查。它涵盖从古代到现代的所有历史时期，包括悬崖上的美索不达米亚岩石浮雕、早期基督教修道院和教堂、早期伊斯兰建筑、奥斯曼时期建筑及二十世纪建筑。哥伦比亚大学的调查覆盖所有历史时代和各类纪念物。我们所调查的众多地点、建筑结构和现存纪念物，旨在记录这片土地及其历史丰富的多样性，而这种多样性正受到蓄意攻击和抹除。我领导的团队由哥伦比亚大学的考古学家，以及驻伊拉克的国家古物与遗产委员会（State Board of Antiquities and Heritage）的同事组成；后者既有来自巴格达的，也有来自伊拉克库尔德斯坦的。我们在现场共同进行纪念物测绘、记录和状况评估。这些资料将来可能用于保存工作。我们所有团队成员都认为，我们的工作是建立历史记录，以抵抗对我们历史的蓄意抹除。这类记录也可以成为未来审理战争罪行的法律程序，以及未来就毁坏行为要求赔偿时的证据。

Some part of this work that we are conducting can now be seen on the Columbia University Art History Department website (see Figure 25). The largest amount of catalogued information, however, is password protected and is now available only if one contacts our content curator directly. Decisions about open access have been difficult in the past two years since ISIS launched their campaign of monument destruction and the deliberate targeting of sites in Iraq and Syria. While the aim of the project is to have open access to all, we have had to face the reality of dangers for our team members in Iraq as well as the possibility that our website might provide locations and information that could be used to target sites.

An additional obstacle for this fieldwork has been the limitations on funding agencies, here in the West, who cannot permit teams like ours to spend their funds in payment to local archaeologists or other workers. As a result, much of the funding that has been allocated for cultural heritage preservation projects in Syria and Iraq has little to do with these lands and is more likely to be allocated to institutions in the United States or Western Europe. In the meantime, many pledges that were made more than a decade ago to provide even the simplest equipment, such as storage cases for museums, have never come through. These announcements appear in press releases and are usually given a great deal of coverage in the news media. However, often the promised aid never arrives.

The problems of preservation in war we are facing today also include the fact that state actors and occupying powers often have hasty restoration or preservation initiatives as a way to claim victory. This was clearly the case with a statement by Russia and UNESCO that they planned to restore Palmyra, soon after it was retaken from ISIS. In response to this declaration, a group of archaeologists (I was among them) wrote a letter to UNESCO asking that no restoration take place until the site could be surveyed.19 Lest one thinks that the Palmyra restoration plan was unique, such work at ancient sites had already taken place in Iraq during the US military occupation.20 While preservation and destruction have long been linked to war and political policy, we now have the added interests of private technology companies setting agendas for preservation work and its methods. In the midst of all these international plans for the future of the historical architecture, monuments, and sites of Iraq and Syria, what we have not heard are the voices of local scholars or local people. This exclusion is perhaps the direct result of the continuing claims – made by some influential cultural heritage preservationists and museum specialists in the West – that the local Iraqis and Syrians have no relationship with, or interest in, the ancient sites. These claims echo the ideology of ISIS, a deliberate dissociation of people from their historical landscape. With the Mapping Mesopotamian Monuments project, our aim is to work in an independent way to document historical architecture and sites that are the history of the great diversity of the land. It is this diversity that is now under attack, in part through the destruction of monuments.

我们今天面对的战时保存问题还包括这样一个事实：国家行为者和占领当局常常仓促提出修复或保存计划，以此宣示胜利。俄罗斯与联合国教科文组织在帕尔米拉刚从ISIS手中被夺回后便宣布计划修复该遗址，就是一个明显例子。为回应这一声明，包括我在内的一组考古学家致信教科文组织，要求在遗址得到调查之前不要开展任何修复工作。[19] 为免有人认为帕尔米拉的修复计划是独一无二的，还应指出，美国军事占领伊拉克期间，古代遗址就已经发生过类似的工作。[20] 尽管保存与毁坏长期以来一直同战争和政治政策相联系，如今私人科技公司的利益又进一步参与决定保存工作的议程和方法。在所有这些关于伊拉克和叙利亚历史建筑、纪念物与遗址未来的国际计划中，我们一直没有听到当地学者或当地民众的声音。这种排斥也许直接源于西方一些有影响力的文化遗产保护者和博物馆专家不断声称：当地伊拉克人与叙利亚人与这些古代遗址没有联系，也不感兴趣。这些论断呼应了ISIS的意识形态，即蓄意将人民与其历史地景分离。通过“美索不达米亚纪念物测绘”项目，我们希望以独立方式记录历史建筑和遗址；它们体现了这片土地极其丰富多样的历史。而如今正遭到攻击的，就是这种多样性；毁坏纪念物只是攻击方式之一。

The power and agency of images and monuments in Mesopotamia has been the main core of my academic work throughout my career. Beginning with the 1995 article ‘Assault and abduction: The fate of the royal image in the Ancient Near East’, Art History 18 (3) (1995): 363–82; followed by The Graven Image: Representation in Babylonia and Assyria (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003), and more recently The Infinite Image: Art, time, and the aesthetic dimension in antiquity (London: Reaktion Books, 2014). As I have made these arguments through numerous books and articles over 20 years, I direct the reader to these publications rather than repeating them here.

I have made this claim in many of my publications, beginning in the 1990s. See my 'Conjuring Mesopotamia: Imaginative geography and a world past', in Archaeology Under Fire, edited by Lynn Meskell, 159–74 (London: Routledge, 1998). For recent news regarding the local sense of identity tied to the ancient remains see: https://www.theguardian.com/world/2016/nov/24/piecing-back-together-iraqi-archeological-gem-blown-sky-high-by-isis. There are also several reports in the Arabic-language press that record similar sentiments expressed by Iraqi soldiers and militia troops who first arrived at the site of Nimrud in November 2016. It is therefore remarkable that the stereotypes of the local ignorance of history continue to dominate both academic writing and accounts in the popular press, where arguments are usually made that this heritage is global and ought not to be considered the property of the nation-states where it now stands. Rather, it should be taken to locations in Europe for safekeeping, as suggested, for example, by the politician François Hollande and by the museum director James Cuno. These calls, for protecting the antiquities from the natives, echo the nineteenth-century discussions regarding the taking of antiquities from the region to museums in Paris and London.

自20世纪90年代起，我已在多篇出版物中提出这一主张。参见拙文“Conjuring Mesopotamia: Imaginative geography and a world past”，载 Lynn Meskell 编 Archaeology Under Fire, 159–74 (London: Routledge, 1998)。有关当地认同与古代遗存联系的近期报道，参见：https://www.theguardian.com/world/2016/nov/24/piecing-back-together-iraqi-archeological-gem-blown-sky-high-by-isis。阿拉伯语媒体中也有若干报道，记录了2016年11月第一批抵达尼姆鲁德遗址的伊拉克士兵和民兵所表达的类似情感。因此，令人惊讶的是，当地人不了解历史的刻板印象仍主导学术写作和大众媒体的叙述；这些论述通常声称，这些遗产属于全球，不应被视为其目前所在民族国家的财产，相反应当转移到欧洲地点妥善保管。政治人物弗朗索瓦·奥朗德和博物馆馆长詹姆斯·库诺（James Cuno）就曾提出这类建议。这些所谓从当地人手中保护古物的呼吁，呼应了十九世纪将该地区古物运往巴黎和伦敦博物馆时的讨论。
