LOUIS P. NELSON

Object Lesson: Monuments and Memory in Charlottesville

"There had been plenty of rumors all the evening through that a mob was gathering." As the dark of night fell, hundreds, "many having masks over their faces," marched through the streets of Charlottesville. Packed in close formation, the torch-lit masked throng marched up Second Street and then turned right on High, proceeding two more blocks to their destination: the north yard of the Albemarle County Courthouse. There they grew in numbers, eventually collecting "hundreds . . . at every corner in all directions," all fueled by "a spirit of riot." Although eerily familiar, this was not the summer of 2017, but exactly one century before.[1]

In the spring of 1917, Hampton Crosby and Richard Jones, both black, had been caught stealing a ham by white policeman Meredith Thomas. After a struggle, Thomas was shot and killed by his own gun. Just days later, Crosby and Jones found themselves detained in the old city jail, which still stands less than a block north of the courthouse. "Shouting and cat-calling" by the mob outside the jail persisted for hours. Authorities were alarmed when they learned that "a large delegation from the student body at the University was expected to join them in the grand march to seize the men and carry out a spectacular lynching at a tree selected near the place of the killing [of Thomas]." The sheriff needed reinforcements and called in an additional hundred men, half coming by train from Staunton. Just after midnight the fire department was called "but the hose was not used against the crowd. It was reported that the men declined to shift their volunteered service from fire-fighting to mob chasing, and would not use the apparatus."[2] The night was tense, but no one pulled the trigger. Into the early hours of the morning the crowd slowly dispersed, having "furnished no leader who could risk those glistening revolvers and shining bayonets seen dimly in the dusky night." Soon after their trial in Richmond that June, Crosby and Jones were electrocuted.[3]

In both 1917 and 2017, white supremacy in Charlottesville was a public performance. White men asserted their presumed authority and public squares became stages of mass intimidation while streets became sites of domestic terrorism. Men carried torches and rope in 1917, shields and semiautomatic weapons in 2017; in both they donned masks, hoods, and capes. In 1917, they directed hours of catcalling to the jail cell windows; in 2017 they chanted "white lives matter" and "Jews will not replace us!" In the more recent events, these objects and figures live large in our imagination through photography and video clips. But in our screen-dependent, image-saturated age, visual memory seems to have dimmed our sensitivity to the power of place and the longer tradition of associating specific places with people or events. Marches, mobs, and other collective displays of intimidation inscribe racism into the very fabric of our cities. Invisible to the nonresident, the legacy of ritualized racism in the mind of the resident is not easily erased from the palimpsest of place. And these public assertions of racial hierarchies—episodic yet highly visible—reinforce the silent but unyielding geographies of race. In many inland Southern cities like Charlottesville, "historically disenfranchised African American communities have been relegated to the margins and in many places to low-lying topographic areas in their respective cities while their white counterparts have commandeered higher elevations."[4] Racism in Charlottesville is inscribed in the streets, buildings, squares, and in public monuments.

In the course of just a decade straddling the Cosby-Jones lynching attempt, from the mid-1910s to the mid-1920s, Charlottesville's elites erected a series of four monuments along a high ridge-road that connected the University of Virginia to the heart of downtown. Commissioned and funded by stockbroker and philanthropist Paul Goodloe McIntyre, these four monuments collectively transformed the city: Meriwether Lewis and William Clark (1919); Thomas Jonathan "Stonewall" Jackson (1921); George Rogers Clark (1921); and Robert Edward Lee (1924) (Figure 1).[5] While the installations were nominally monuments to heroic men, they are more importantly charged objects with a particular history that shaped how they functioned socially and politically and what they meant to period viewers. When read through the lens of their specific historic and spatial contexts, these four statues read no longer as monuments to "the Lost Cause" or to Charlottesville's golden age. They are victory monuments, unflinching testaments to the collapse of Reconstruction and the re-establishment of white supremacy. And as public art they inscribed that victory into the fabric of the city.[6]

The Stonewall Jackson Monument, 1921
(502 feet above sea level; 24 feet tall)
On that late night in April of 1917, the torch-lit mob centered their attention on an alley between residences that gave direct access to the county jail from the county courthouse (Figure 2, numbers 5 and 6, and letter A). The mob filled High Street and the open spaces around the Thomas Jefferson–designed courthouse. As reported in the local paper, the Daily Progress, they also spilled down McKee Street, which divided Courthouse Square from McKee's Row, a block of rental tenements occupied largely by African Americans. Contemporary whites described the tenements as "ramshackle" and "an eyesore" (Figure 2, number 7; Figure 3).[7] In the same years that the hooded mob gathered outside the jail to threaten Crosby and Jones with lynching, Charlottesville's white community was making plans to tear down McKee's Row and replace it with a school for white children.[8] Just over four years later, Senator Pat Harrison of Mississippi offered a hagiographic celebration of Stonewall Jackson at the unveiling of the new equestrian statue erected in his honor, on the spot previously occupied by McKee's Row. The "eyesore" had been replaced not with a white school but with a white memorial (Figure 2, number 2; Figure 4). The equestrian statue features Jackson leaning forward atop a horse approaching a canter. The figures are supported by a bold pink granite pedestal dominated by spectacular allegorical figures of Faith and Valor. The two strong, strikingly Aryan youth carry a shield adorned with the stars and bars. Placed at what had formerly been street level, Faith and Valor replaced the "rowdy" residents of McKee's Row. The unveiling was the capstone of three days of celebration that included a grand gala reunion of Confederate veterans and a five thousand-person march through the city. It concluded with white school children formed as a living representation of the Confederate banner in Midway Plaza, which crowned the north slope of the city's largest African American neighborhood, Vinegar Hill (Figure 2, letter B).[9]

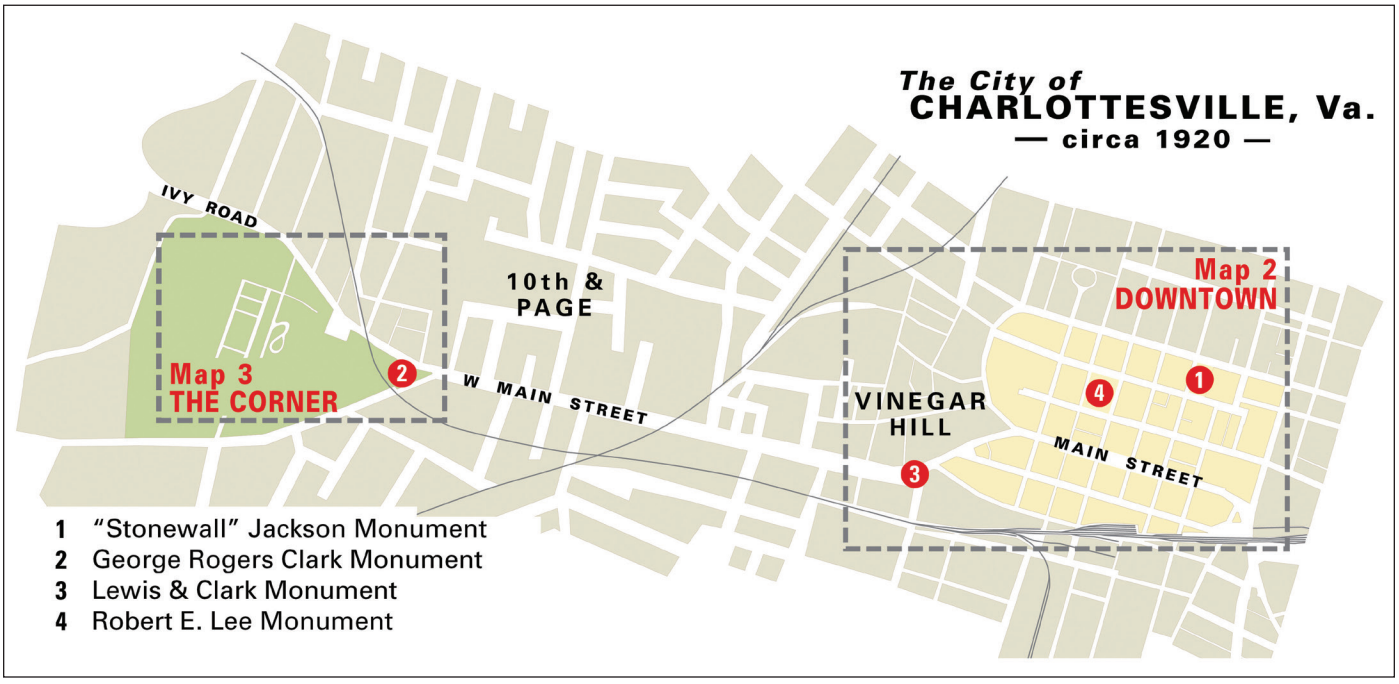

Figure 1. Map of Charlottesville, circa 1920, showing the location of the four monuments and two of the majority African American neighborhoods, 10th and Page and Vinegar Hill. Map by Andrew Marshall.

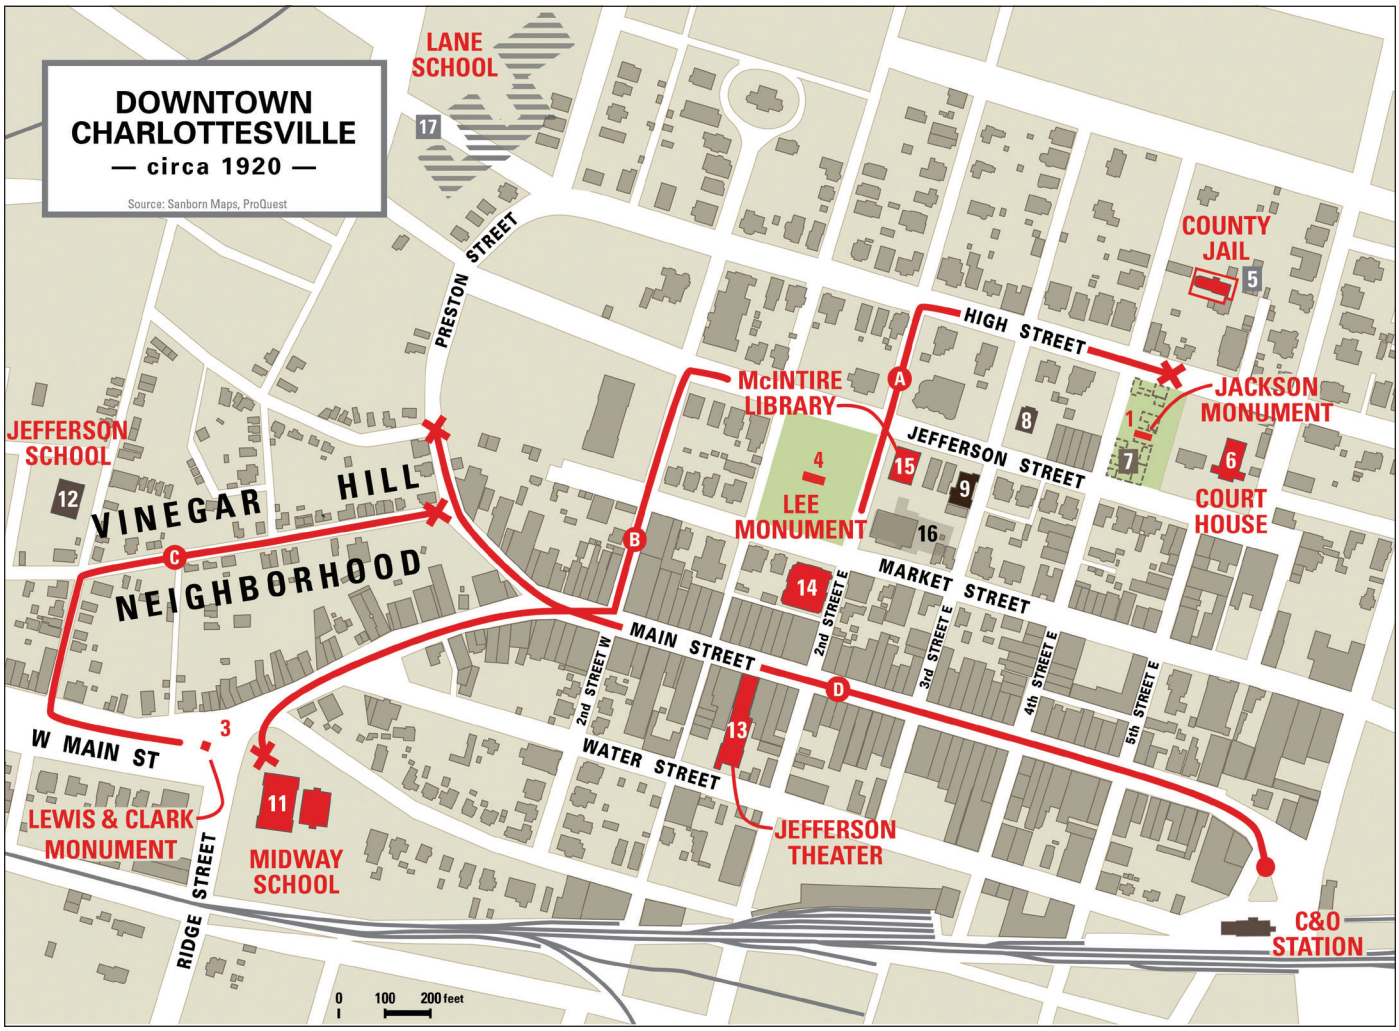

Figure 2. Detailed map of downtown Charlottesville, circa 1920, showing the location of various monuments and buildings discussed in the article and routes mapped out for marches and parades. 1: Stonewall Jackson Monument; 3: Lewis and Clark and Sacagawea Monument; 4: Robert E. Lee Monument; 5: Albemarle County Jail; 6: Albemarle County Courthouse; 7: McKee's Row; 8: Beth Israel Synagogue; 9: Holy Comforter Catholic Church; 11: Midway School; 12: Jefferson Graded School; 13: Jefferson Theater; 14: First Presbyterian Church; 15: McIntire Library; 16: Post Office, 1939 outline; 17: Lane High School; A: 1917 lynch mob; B: 1921 Confederate Veterans Parade; C: 1915 Halloween parade of KKK-clad children thorough Vinegar Hill; D: 1924 Grand Parade of the KKK. Map by Andrew Marshall.

Figure 3. McKee's Row. Rufus W. Holsinger, Holsinger Studio Collection, Albert and Shirley Small Collection, University of Virginia.

In the 1910s and 1920s, Courthouse Square—the location of McKee's Row and the courthouse with its attendant jail and the site of the lynch mob and eventually the Jackson monument—was the center of Charlottesville's political, legal, and civil authority.[10] It was here that the laws of the city, the state, and the nation shaped the lives of local citizens. It was here that in the half century following the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment black Charlottesvillians saw the legal and political recognition of their citizenship slowly recede. This square was also within two blocks of buildings housing Charlottesville's Catholic and Jewish congregations. As early as 1900, the Virginia Conference of Colored Men met at the Odd Fellow's Hall to discuss methods of resisting African American political disenfranchisement. Within ten years, black political and legal authority had been so diminished as to erase their very presence from the landscape of citizenship. In his dedication speech for the Jackson monument, Senator Harrison noted that in the Civil War a nation was torn apart by "fratricidal strife." There was no recognition of black presence; Harrison assumed his audience to be white. As Kirk Savage has pointed out, this common postwar language draws from Sophocles's narrative of two brothers fighting on opposite sides in the war against Thebes. In such classic accounts, the brothers are worthy of honor but the slaves who also died on the battlefield were given no space in the story. And this framework for post–Civil War "reconciliation" was convenient for those working to exclude African Americans from the nation's new social contract.[11] Such familial language is part and parcel of a reconstituted Southern identity that Dell Upton has described as "unambiguously white."[12] But what did "white" mean in the 1910s and 1920s? As recent scholarship on the Ku Klux Klan (KKK) reinforces, elite Protestants constructed "white" in this period in opposition to black, but white in their view did not include all non-blacks. In this era of massive immigration, "white" also excluded immigrants, Jews, and Catholics, categories of individuals who were not considered part of the American historical and political project.[13] Like the Jackson monument itself, Harrison's speech was an act of both intimidation and erasure. So was the demolition of McKee's Row, which had stood within two blocks of the city's Catholic Church and Jewish Synagogue (Figure 2, numbers 8, 9). And so was the threat of lynching. And so was the creation of a living Confederate banner, composed of white boys and girls, immediately above the city's largest and most densely populated African American neighborhood. Taken together, these urban rituals, public speeches, and the physical remaking of the city were the product of collective action by the city's population of white Southern-born Protestants.

Asserting political authority in Charlottesville felt increasingly important to this collective of the white majority during the late 1910s. The message was clear to African Americans in the city who organized a local chapter of the NAACP in the summer of 1918, one year after the attempted lynching of Crosby and Jones.[14] The summer and early autumn of 1919 brought a series of national race riots that were quickly folded into the much broader paranoia and trauma then unfolding across the nation, including the social unrest associated with the Wall Street bombing and deep anxieties over both anarchists and communists that fueled the Palmer Raids, to name just a few. The race riots began in Charleston, South Carolina, in May, and erupted also in Washington, D.C.; Norfolk, Virginia; Knoxville, Tennessee; and Omaha, Nebraska, eventually taking place in thirty-eight cities across the country. The worst was seen in Chicago, where riots lasted for thirteen days in August. Racial tension must have been palpable in Charlottesville as riots erupted in both nearby Washington and Norfolk. And then, in August of 1920, Congress passed the Nineteenth Amendment, giving women the right to vote. Soon thereafter, the chairman of Virginia's Democratic Party sent out an appeal notifying all white women in Virginia that "the negro women are making desperate efforts to register." This was in his mind a serious problem since "the negro women are more intelligent than the negro men, therefore much more successful in meeting the requirements of the registration law." His appeal was to "look to Democratic white women of the state, whether they favor equal suffrage or not, to maintain the prestige, the integrity, the traditions, and the honor of Virginia."[15] The threat of black agency overshadowed even the arrival of women's suffrage. And finally, in February of 1921, the Daily Progress published a portion of a speech by an African American activist from the St. Louis Urban League. The article announced:

Figure 4. Charles Keck (sculptor), Thomas Jonathan "Stonewall" Jackson Monument, 1921, Charlottesville, Virginia. Photograph by Dell Upton, 2002.

The New Negro of Charlottesville wants:

1. Teachers' salaries based on service not on color
2. A four year high school
3. Representation on City Council
4. 'Jim Crow' street cars abolished
5. Representation on School Board
6. Better street facilities in Negro districts

We are tax payers and law abiding citizens. We know our strength and will accept nothing short of justice![16]

With the relative freedom of an outsider, George W. Buckner gave voice to Charlottesville's structural racism: income inequities, education injustice, black political disenfranchisement, and unequal neighborhood investment. Charlottesville's white majority responded by describing the propositions as "impossible."[17]

By 1921, racial tensions in Charlottesville boiled over. That summer, the KKK organized a public address inside the courthouse just feet from where the Jackson monument would be unveiled in October (Figure 2, number 6). The public address was supported by bulletins posted around town that warned that "law and order must prevail." They announced: "All undesirables must leave town. The eye of the unknown has been and is constantly observing. . . . We See All, We Hear All, We Know All." The bulletin ended with an invitation. Any "100 percent" white native born American man who "held to the tenets of the Christian religion, Free Schools, Free Speech, Free Press, Law Enforcement, Liberty, and White Supremacy" (italics added) was welcome to join.[18] The KKK spoke openly in the space of the courthouse about the enforcement of white supremacy as essential to the preservation of the ideals of the Confederacy. Charlottesville's non-white audience certainly got the message. When the echoes of their voices faded and the bulletins all melted in the rain, the monumental statue of Stonewall Jackson and its Aryan youth—erected just months after the KKK spoke inside the courthouse—would serve to remind black and white Charlottesvillians of the unspoken requirements for full citizenship: a highly circumscribed conception of "whiteness."[19]

The George Rogers Clark Statue, 1921
(505 feet above sea level; 24 feet tall)

Just two weeks after the unveiling of the Stonewall Jackson monument in Courthouse Square, Charlottesvillians gathered once again to reveal an even larger monument: an equestrian statue of Virginian son and Revolutionary War figure George Rogers Clark (Figure 5). In the composition, Clark faces a group of three Native Americans. A kneeling woman, wrapped in a blanket, holds up a cradleboard as if to plead for an unseen child. The central figure is a chief standing erect, also wrapped in a blanket, with long braided hair that spills across his shoulders. A second male figure, with two feathers in his hair, crouches at his feet. His blanket is open to the rear, exposing a knife that portends the possibility of resistance. With his right hand Clark gestures an invitation to join three members of his expedition grouped behind him. These men are clearly part of his regiment, but the ambiguous facial features suggest that at least one might be Native American, now acculturated and submitting to white cultural norms. The figural group sits atop a granite pedestal, much plainer than that supporting Jackson, which simply names Clark "Conqueror of the Northwest." The gesture of invitation made by Clark's extended hand is undermined by the powder keg behind him and the heroic pronouncement of Clark as conqueror. The invitation had no real options: join or perish. University of Virginia (UVA) president Edwin Alderman heralded the unveiling with a speech that extolled "the son of this soil, a hero, a pioneer, and a conqueror."[20]

The monument stands in a small triangle of grass adjacent to West Main Street and separating the eateries of the Corner from the University hospital (Figure 6, numbers 2 and 10). This location seems curious in the contemporary city, but it made sense in the early 1920s. This site, among the easternmost parcels owned by the University of Virginia, tied this monument to the three statues downtown via the critical artery of Main Street. As mentioned by one commentator, the statue "will make an imposing scene at the entrance to the University."[21] And many of those arrivals would be African Americans. Throughout the twentieth century and right up to the present, the high ground of Main Street, which connects the University to the city, is flanked by low-lying historically African American neighborhoods like the 10th and Page neighborhood, occupied by those who worked (and still work) as janitorial staff in residences in the city and in the halls and classrooms of the University (Figure 1). At their lowest point, these neighborhoods are more than thirty-three feet below Main Street and the Clark monument.

With its three groups—Clark on a horse, acculturated Native Americans, and the defiant resistance of the chief—the monument is an essay on the hierarchies of race, scientific studies of genetic superiority, and the period discourse on civility and savagery. As understood by one commentator, "The conqueror of the Northwest is evidently explaining the futility of a resistance."[22] When pitted against the clear superiority of white Americans, the racial inferiority of Native Americans was expected to be self-evident; their best hope was to abandon their savagery and take the long road of submission to white civility. This interpretation of the monument is made clearer when read in its urban context. While the Clark statue revealed to all those who passed by the futility of resisting white authority, the building complex immediately beyond—the hospital of the University of Virginia—housed the classrooms of Dr. Paul Barringer, professor of physiology, who spent his life researching white racial superiority through the study of eugenics.[23] Barringer was president of the faculty when UVA built its very first hospital in 1901. Approaching the University from the city, the new hospital was the first University building one would see after passing the Clark monument.

Barringer professed the intrinsic racial inferiority of African Americans. In his 1900 publication The American Negro: His Past and Future, Barringer states his case:

> The American negro is the resultant of a combination of forces, each one of which can be isolated and analyzed. I will show from the study of his racial history (phylogeny) that his late tendency to return to barbarism is as natural as the return of the > sow that is washed to her wallowing in the mire. I will show that the ages of degradation under which he was formed and the fifty centuries of historically recorded savagery with which he came to us cannot be permanently influenced by one or two centuries of enforced correction.[24]

Figure 5. Robert Ingersoll Aitken (sculptor), George Rogers Clark Monument, 1921, Charlottesville, Virginia. Photograph by author, January, 2018.

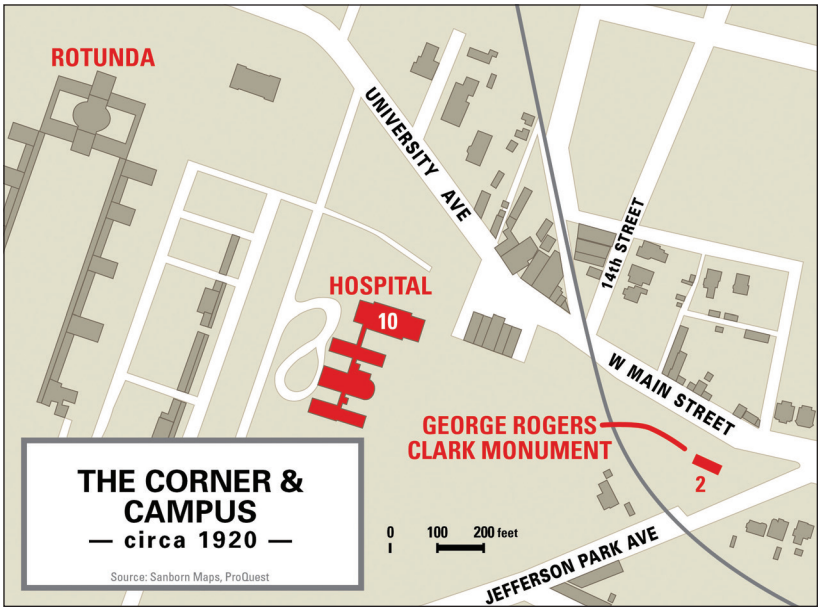

Figure 6. Detailed map of the Corner and the University hospital, circa 1920. 2: George Rogers Clark Monument; 10: University of Virginia Hospital. Map by Andrew Marshall.

The African American community did not receive Barringer's arguments quietly. An editor of the Colored American, an African American periodical published in Washington, D.C., offered a response to a Barringer lecture:

> In composing the correspondence I am now sitting in full view of "Monticello" where rests the remains of the immortal Thomas Jefferson, and I am sure if it were possible for Jefferson to arise from his grave and find that the grand old University of Virginia, of which he is the founder, has such a man as the chairman of the faculty, who would make such base utterances as the Doctor is quoted to have made against an inoffensive people, his next request would be "Let me go back immediately to Mother Earth."[25]

Not all educated Americans adhered to views such as Barringer's and certainly the community of educated African Americans leveled objections. Nonetheless, in Charlottesville, the tide of popular adherence to such views was turning with the tide of scientific racism.

Seen through this lens, "the futility of resistance" takes on a whole new meaning. Barringer and many others at the University adhered to a biologically determinist view of humanity that enlisted science to assert a hierarchy of the races. Eugenicists argued that selective sterilization could and should improve the human race. This included the selective sterilization of some whites and the widespread sterilization of "inferior" races, including blacks but also Jews and other non-whites. In this way, the death of resistant Native Americans (or African Americans for that matter) followed a recommended and natural course of genetic winnowing and racial improvement.

Barringer's teachings were closely aligned with the convictions of the Virginia Grand Dragon of the KKK when he spoke at a 1922 meeting of the Charlottesville chapter: "The destinies of America shall remain with the white race; they shall never be entrusted to the black, the brown, or the yellow, or to the unclean hands of hybrids or mongrels."[26] The newspaper article describing this speech concluded by noting that the Charlottesville chapter was not among the largest in the state but that it boasted "many of our able and influential citizens." And strong support for the KKK's views appears also to have permeated the student body. That same year, the student yearbook published white-hooded equestrian riders as the cover page to the Clubs and Organizations section of the University yearbook, Corks and Curls (Figure 7). And just two years later, these genetic assessments became legislation with the passage of both the Racial Integrity Act and the Virginia Sterilization Act. Virginia's Racial Integrity Act built this definition into the legal code of the state, most clearly through its famous "one drop rule": a Virginian had to be 100 percent white to be identified as a white American. The Virginia Sterilization Act was challenged but upheld by the Supreme Court and became a model law for other states. (The Virginia General Assembly apologized for the act's blatant racism in 2001.) Soon after the passage of the Racial Integrity Act, Dr. Ivey Lewis, the Miller Professor of Biology at UVA, delivered a public lecture on the importance of the new law, arguing, "The mixing of whites with blacks was the chief cause of the fall of civilizations of Rome, Greece, Egypt, and India." Cross-racial breeding, he continued, produced in whites a "laxness of morals and a crumbling of culture."[27] Then just months later, the University's Anglo-Saxon Club announced a lecture in Madison Hall by Earnest Sevier Cox, the legislator who worked most fervently to see the Virginia General Assembly pass the Racial Integrity Act. This was the party line: white elite men (by which they meant Protestant white men born in the South) who had enjoyed the great benefits of a UVA education had a moral, even patriotic, responsibility to defend the purity of their race. All those passing by the entrance to the University, newly ornamented with the monument to the Conqueror of the Northwest, would be reminded of the inevitable authority of whites. Contemporary medical science conveniently reinforced the politics of Courthouse Square.[28]

The Lewis and Clark (and Sacagawea) Monument, 1919

(486 feet above sea level; 18 feet tall)

The earliest of this series of monuments to be installed in Charlottesville's cityscape commemorated Meriwether Lewis and William Clark, younger brother of George Rogers Clark (Figure 8). The third figure in the grouping, Sacagawea, crouching below and behind the two white men, was (and is) commonly left out of the statue's naming. Commemorating the expedition commissioned by Thomas Jefferson, numerous contemporaries understood this work to be in conversation with that of Clark's brother since they marked each end of the street connecting the University and the city. But if George Rogers Clark bore the imperial charge to conquer the Northwest, his younger brother carried the charge of discovery and documentation. The pedestal of the monument bore the burden of interpretation. It tells viewers that these two men were "farseeing pathfinders" (when in fact that was Sacagawea's role) who "revealed an unknown empire." The expedition was made famous in part for all the artifacts returned to Virginia and exhibited in the entry hall of Monticello. This monument to the Enlightenment project of discovery stood in the midst of Midway Plaza, the park at the intersection of Main and Ridge Streets. It carried the name of the school that stood on the hill just above it: the Midway School (Figure 2, number 11). It was this same park that would two years later host the above-mentioned living Confederate banner. In February of 1890, the city's school board, "being of opinion that a high school for this community is a necessity for the completion of a thorough system of public education," embarked on the project of adding to the existing Midway School the necessary accommodations for a high school department.[29] The Midway School was, of course, all white.

Just downhill from Midway Plaza stood Charlottesville's African American school: the Jefferson Graded School (Figure 2, number 12). Although founded in the years just after the Civil War, the building that stood on the site was completed in 1894. It did not include a high school. The only option for high school education for Charlottesville's black community was to board their children at schools in Richmond or Lynchburg, a prohibitive expense for most. This injustice and inequity was noted even among the white readership of the Richmond newspapers when in 1895 the Charlottesville correspondent to the Richmond Planet urged local leaders to "unite and ask for" a high school for black students.[30] And the absence was not for lack of demand; black teachers reported classrooms of fifty children each.[31] Overfull classrooms meant that there was clear need for more teachers and more space and that there was an obvious pipeline that would support a high school. Charlottesville's black community leaders deeply objected to the notion—informed by the emerging field of eugenics—that African American children had only manual and no intellectual capacity. In 1914, for example, the city's black pastors all simultaneously protested from their pulpits "against colored boys being educated to work with their hands."[32] This objection was not against manual labor per se but the supposition that all boys should be tracked toward manual labor and denied the rigorous intellectual training of a classical liberal arts education. Such tracking, of course, structurally disadvantaged a whole generation of African Americans when they applied to colleges and universities. In response, the white school superintendent closed the Jefferson school's woodshop.

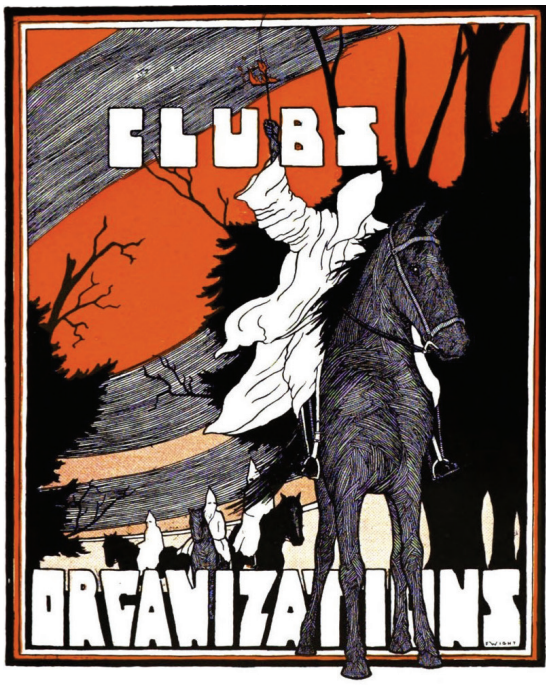

Figure 7. Clubs and Organizations cover page, Corks and Curls, 1922. University of Virginia library.

Figure 8. Charles Keck (sculptor), Meriwether Lewis and William Clark [and Sacagawea] Monument, 1919, Charlottesville, Virginia. Photograph by the author, January 2018.

The collective action for education justice by Charlottesville's African American leadership unsettled the city's Protestant white elite. Just over a year later a group of white Charlottesville residents dressed their children for Halloween as "a gay battalion of the Ku Klux Klan," which thundered down "from the heights of Midway." During this overt display of white intimidation, "many a dusky denizen of 'the bottom' was seen to shrink instinctively back into the shadows of Preston Avenue, as they swept along" (Figure 2, letter C).[33] Running from Midway Plaza to the heart of Vinegar Hill, the children descended almost fifty-six feet, a steep descent. That this public performance by white children began at the white school and ran through the neighborhood of Vinegar Hill cannot have been coincidence. As African Americans began a campaign for education justice, the city's whites enlisted their own children to perform ritualized racism through Charlottesville's racialized urban topography. Halloween was an opportunity to remind the African American residents of Vinegar Hill not to challenge the established racialized hierarchy of education. Just two years later, the white community installed the new monument to the explorers, a public monument that carried the implicit message that inquiry and discovery was a white mandate and that the work of racial others was, like Sacagawea's tracking, limited to the natural and the manual.

But such efforts at intimidation did not have the desired effect. After the World War I armistice, Reverend Clarence Long, the pastor of the African American First Baptist Church on West Main Street, took up the vigorous campaign for a black high school. His church was just a few blocks from the Jefferson School. As described by one of the first teachers at the Jefferson High School (finally opened in 1926), Long "stirred up the white people so much that they thought it better to concede to the African American community's demand for a high school than to allow him to stir up the African American community any further."[34] The resistance of the white community was so great, she reported, that Long eventually left Charlottesville. Speaking to the situation in 1921, the St. Louis Urban League called out the need for a four-year high school for black students. African American collective action eventually resulted in a successful petition to the school board for the construction of a high school on the site of the Jefferson Graded School. But when it was opened in 1926, it offered only a two-year course of study and not a full four-year course as was the case at the Midway School. The superintendent had concluded that "it will be a long, long time before there will be pupils enough to justify a four year course for a colored high school in this city."[35] He was incorrect. The program expanded to include all four years by the 1929–30 school year.

The Robert E. Lee Monument, 1924
(486 feet above sea level; 26 feet tall)
The monument to Robert E. Lee was the last of the four to be installed (Figure 2, number 4; Figure 9). As with the Jackson monument, the week of its unveiling was filled with festivals and galas organized especially to celebrate the last surviving Confederate veterans. One of the events was the ritual opening of the Grand Camp of the Confederate Veterans of Virginia, which took place in the downtown Jefferson Theater, the center of white Charlottesville's social life (Figure 2, number 13). The ladies of the Confederacy were welcomed in the theater that evening. The most public spectacle, aside from the unveiling, was the grand parade of the Ku Klux Klan. "Thousands lined the sidewalks of Main Street from the C&O Station to the foot of Vinegar Hill," the newspaper reported (Figure 2, letter D). The nighttime "march of the white robed figures was impressive and directed attention to the presence of the organization in the community."[36] The conclusion of the parade at Vinegar Hill was surely no accident and certainly focused attention in Charlottesville's African American community. The week culminated in a grand Confederate Ball to be held in UVA's Memorial Gymnasium (Figure 10). Admission was limited to members of Confederate organizations, especially the Daughters and Sons of Confederate Veterans. The announcement of the ball also noted that the Sons of Confederate Veterans were now accepting applications from grandsons.[37] The KKK appears to have had a special relationship with Memorial Gym; just a decade earlier, the Klan offered a generous gift of $10,000 to UVA for the construction of that same facility. All of this for the celebration of Robert E. Lee.

Figure 9. Henry Shrady and Leo Lentelli (sculptors), Robert E. Lee Monument, 1924, Charlottesville, Virginia. Photograph by Bill Emory, Summer 2016.

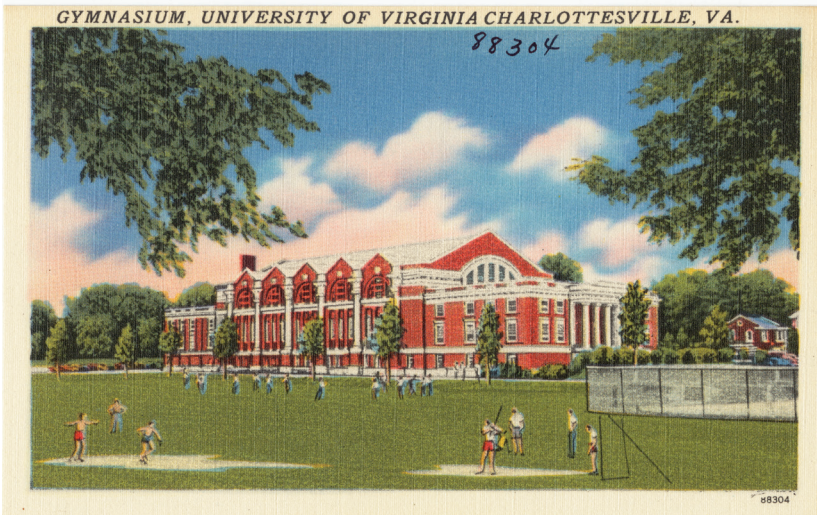

Figure 10. "Gymnasium, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Va." Postcard, 1930–45. Tichnor Brothers Postcard Collection, Boston Public Library.

If George Washington was the father of our country, then Robert E. Lee was the patriarch of the Confederacy. So said Edwin Alderman, UVA's president, on the occasion of the unveiling of the Lee monument: "The South's great Chieftain had done even more than his great prototype, Washington," Alderman continued, stating that Lee "was the embodiment of the best that there is in all the sincere and romantic history of the whole state. Its triumphs, its defeats, its joys, its sufferings, its rebirth, its pride, and its patience center in him."[38] By the opening decades of the twentieth century, the liturgies of the cult of Lee were already deeply entrenched in the self-fashioning of white Southerners. Just months after the unveiling of the Lee statue, the pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, which then faced onto the park that was then called Lee Square, "described social life in the South before and during the war . . . with all that made it ideal and charming" (Figure 2, number 14).[39] When Richmond unveiled its own Lee statue, one African American resident in that city noted its message: "The Southern white folks is on top."[40]

If the society and culture of the (presumably white) Old South were reimagined as charming, then black culture was recast as its antithesis. The Jefferson Theater, just two blocks away from the Lee monument, rescreened Birth of a Nation (first released in 1915) just months after the unveiling.[41] The Daily Progress touted the film as "the greatest picture of the age."[42] The newspaper noted that the film's rescreening "is drawing as large crowds as it did originally." The Jefferson Theater offered multiple screenings a day as "thousands want to see it a second time."[43] The picture was notorious for its portrayal of African Americans as unintelligent and oversexed. The NAACP attempted to have the film banned. Just days later the Daily Progress ran a series of teaser ads announcing the arrival of a minstrel show for charity in the Jefferson Theater. Made up largely of white men in blackface, the minstrel show openly mocked African Americans. Using common visual language of the day, the ads exhibited highly caricatured and stereotyped images of black men (Figures 11, 12, 13).[44] The Grand Camp of the Confederates, the screening of Birth of a Nation, and the openly racist minstrel shows were all part of the rebirth of the Old South in the imaginations of white Southerners. During the same months of these and other social spectacles, the KKK set off "heavy explosions from three bombs," and then burned a cross in the yard of an African American church just outside of town. The event was attended by fifty Klansmen, "only about six of them masked."[45] The notable choice of many Klansmen to attend unmasked reveals their sense that the battle for public opinion had been won. (This same confidence resurfaced in 2017 when the KKK paraded unmasked but in full regalia and then unmasked neo-Nazis stormed the streets of downtown.) It was no accident that these early twentieth-century events all took place in the Jefferson Theater. The erection of the Lee monument was the culminating act in the remaking of a city as the new Old South, with all the attendant political, racial, educational, and cultural implications.

The unveiling of the Robert E. Lee statue in 1924 was the completion of the first campaign for the remaking of the city and the beginning of the second. Paul McIntire's gift of the monument to Lee was the second of two installations on Lee Park. Begun in 1919 to house the city's public library, the McIntire Building, located

TIC
SALE
Mill Ends
oods is advancing s sale to save our and summer cotton
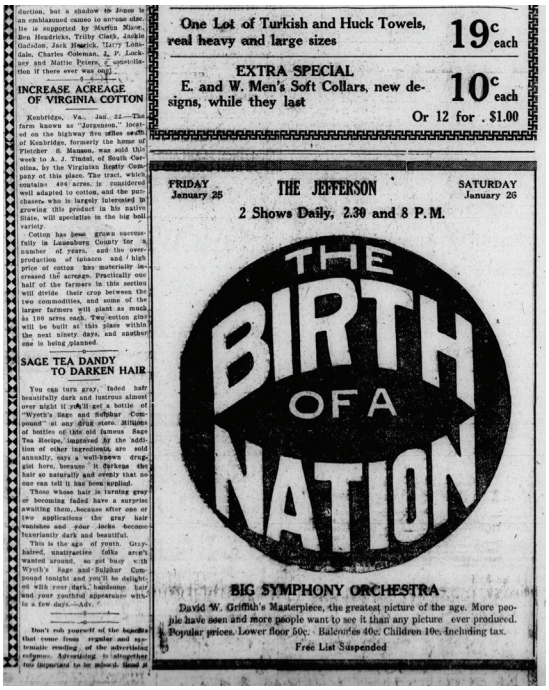
ut 1-2 actual selling
19c yd
Sheeting 98c
Gowns, $1.75, $2.00, $2.50, $3.00
Teddys, $1.50, $2.00, $2.50
On Second Floor
Hawkins Bros. & Co.
SMITH, OF NORFOLK HAS BILL TO PUNISH SHEIKS AND VAMPS
Home-destroying vamps and wife-stealing sheiks at last have cause to tremble for their safety. Heretofore, these offenders against the happiness and sanctity of the home have had only the wrath of the victim of their wiles to consider, but a bill introduced in the Senate yesterday places them within the clutches of the law.
The proposed measure makes the destruction of a home a misdemeanor. It applies equally to men and women. The Senator explained that the absence of any clause in the general law dealing with this offense had been brought to his attention, and that the least the State could do was to make this heinous offense punishable as are the lesser crimes.
Senator Smith also introduced a bill placing the headlight law back where it was prior to the last session. The bill requires automobiles to dim their lights when approaching another vehicle, and to keep them dimmed until the vehicles are abreast.
Dr. J. S. Yates singing one of his famous songs without words. This will be the last time that the Dr. will sing for the Elks as he is going to join Al G. Fields show.
Cash and Delivery Dept.
Small Sugar Cured Hams, without fat and skin, per lb. 25c
Picnic Hams per lb. 14½c

Figure 11. Detail, Daily Progress, Charlottesville, Virginia, January 25, 1924, page 6.



One Lot of Turkish and Huck Towels, real heavy and large sizes 19c each
EXTRA SPECIAL
E. and W. Men's Soft Collars, new designs, while they last 10c each
Or 12 for . $1.00
INCREASE ACREAGE OF VIRGINIA COTTON
Kenbridge, Va., Jan. 22.—The farm known as "Jorgunon," located on the highway five miles south of Kenbridge, formerly the home of Fletcher S. Manson, was sold this week to A. J. Tindal, of South Carolina, by the Virginian Realty Company of this place. The tract, which contains 400 acres, is considered well adapted to cotton, and the purchaser, who is largely interested in growing this product in his native State, will specialize in the big boll variety.
Cotton has been grown successfully in Lunenburg County for a number of years, and the overproduction of tobacco and high price of cotton has materially increased the acreage. Practically one half of the farmers in this section will divide their crop between the two commodities, and some of the larger farmers will plant as much as 100 acres each. Two cotton gins will be built at this place within the next ninety days, and another one is being planned.
SAGE TEA DANDY TO DARKEN HAIR
You can turn gray, faded hair beautifully dark and lustrous almost over night if you'll get a bottle of "Wyeth's Sage and Sulphur Compound" at any drug store. Millions of bottles of this old famous Sage Tea Recipe, improved by the addition of other ingredients, are sold annually, says a well-known druggist here, because it darkens the hair so naturally and evenly that no one can tell it has been applied.
Those whose hair is turning gray or becoming faded have a surprise awaiting them, because after one or two applications the gray hair vanishes and your locks become luxuriantly dark and beautiful.
This is the age of youth. Grey-haired, unattractive folks aren't wanted around, so get busy with Wyeth's Sage and Sulphur Compound tonight and you'll be delighted with your dark, handsome hair and your youthful appearance within a few days.—Adv.
Don't rob yourself of the benefits that come from regular and systematic reading of the advertising columns. Advertising is altogether too important to be passed by.
FRIDAY January 25 THE JEFFERSON SATURDAY January 26
2 Shows Daily, 2.30 and 8 P.M.
THE BIRTH OF A NATION
BIG SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
David W. Griffith's Masterpiece, the greatest picture of the age. More people have seen and more people want to see it than any picture ever produced. Popular prices. Lower floor 50c. Balconies 40c. Children 10c. Including tax.
Free List Suspended

Figure 12. Detail, Daily Progress, Charlottesville, Virginia, January 24, 1924, page 7.

on the northeast corner of the park, served as an appropriately romanticized backdrop for the Lee monument and triggered an aesthetic transformation of the city's public architecture (Figure 2, number 15; Figure 14). Now housing the Albemarle Charlottesville Historical Society, the building was built of red brick with a crowning classical cornice and balustrade all fronted by a graceful curve of white columns. This is a stylistic tradition architectural historians identify as the colonial revival.[46] The building was distinctive enough to warrant publication in a variety of architectural magazines and regular visits by students of architecture.[47] With clear visual quotations from Monticello, the University, and local plantations like Bremo, these visual cues provided an ideal architectural setting for the rebirth of "old Virginia" as a historical past filled with all that was ideal and charming (Figures 15 and 16).

In gratitude to Paul McIntire for his generous gift of the new, spectacular library to the city, the Board of Managers wrote in 1921 asking for permission to name the library in his honor more of merchandise. These hose are a good value and are absolutely guaranteed.

J. D. & J. S. TILMAN
"The Shopping Center"
SOCIAL AND PERSONAL
Important Meeting.
The Penny Band of the Presbyterian Church will meet tomorrow afternoon at the Church at 3:30 o'clock.
The members of the society are doing some very interesting as well as useful work, and it is hoped that every member will be present.
Personals.
Mr. Howard Connock who was operated on for Appendicitis, Monday by Dr. J. Fulton Williams is improving.
Miss Elizabeth Kearney is in New York for a short visit to friends.
The Messrs. Sidney and Verginius Ruffin, of Gordonsville are spending a while with their aunt, Mrs. R. M. McMurdo, during the illness at their home, of their maternal grandmother, Mrs. G. M. Osborne.
ELK NEWS
Bradshaw Hutchinson, singing, "I Got Licker Enough For the Rest of My Life Providing I Die Right Now."

Figure 13. Detail, Daily Progress, Charlottesville, Virginia, February 1, 1924, page 6.

Figure 14. McIntire Library (now the Albemarle Charlottesville Historical Society), Charlottesville, Virginia, 1921. Photograph by by author, May 2018.

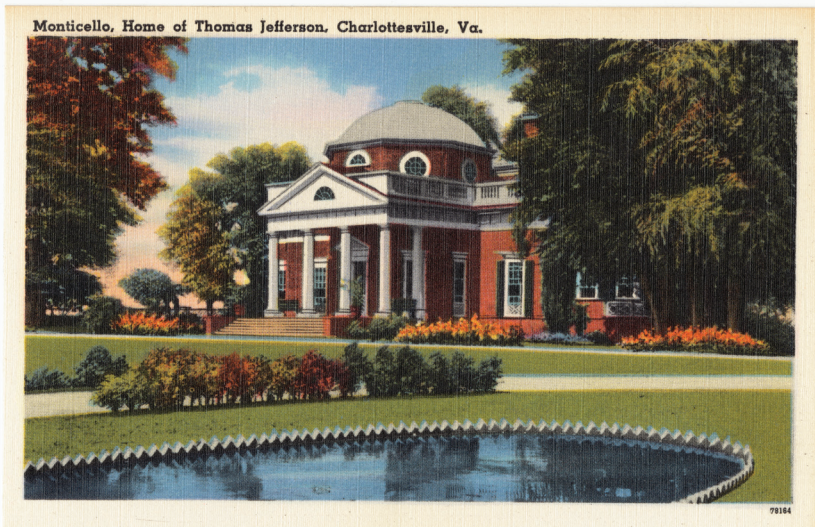

Figure 15. "Monticello, Home of Thomas Jefferson, Charlottesville, Va.," Postcard, 1930–45. Tichnor Brothers Postcard Collection, Boston Public Library.

Figure 16. Bremo Plantation, Fluvanna County, Virginia. Photograph by author, 2015.

and to convey their commitment to stewarding his "high purpose in providing this beautiful building with its rich contents for the use of the people."[48] But the library was not really for all of the people of Charlottesville. Although it is never explicitly stated in any of the early records, the McIntire Library was intended for Charlottesville's white citizens. This fact was made explicit in June of 1934, when the publicly-funded library opened its first branch library, the "colored branch" in the Jefferson School (Figure 17). Even though the library in the Jefferson School quickly grew to over 850 registered borrowers per month, it had no effect on the monthly tallies of borrowers using the McIntire Library, which remains unchanged through the end of 1934. Even though the McIntire Library was a white only space (excepting of course the black janitor Albert Southall) the Board of Managers waffled on whether they should even open a "Colored Branch," describing the move to make books publicly available to Charlottesville's black citizens as "inadvisable."[49] And when they did finally make the move to open the branch library, they opened it with almost exclusively works of fiction, noting that "little or no non-fiction was available."[50] As implicitly asserted by the Lewis and Clark monument, inquiry and discovery was reserved for the white intellect. And, finally, the $240 annual salary for the Jefferson School librarian was half that of the night librarian at the McIntire Library and less than one-quarter the salary of the head librarian.[51] The McIntire Library launched an important aesthetic renaissance in Charlottesville's architecture, reviving the architectural tradition of the city's pre–Civil War landscape. But it was also an important building that—standing in the shadow of the Robert E. Lee Memorial—further institutionalized unequal access to public resources and the structural inequality of the city's public sphere. The colonial revival style of McIntire Library inaugurated the architecture of white supremacy.

Since at least the 1980s, historians have understood the connection between the increasing popularity of the colonial revival style and the rise of immigration, especially in the cities of the northeast. The first curator of the American Wing of the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City, for example, wanted to offer "a visual personification of home life in this country," because he feared that "the influx of foreign ideas utterly at variance with those held by the men who gave us the Republic, threaten, and unless checked, may shake the foundations," of American life.[52] But the colonial revival was also a romantic program intended to affirm white supremacy, which in Charlottesville included supremacy over blacks as well as Jews, Catholics, and immigrants.[53]

With the completion of the McIntire Building the "rebirth" imagined by Alderman would begin to take shape in architecture across the city. While the first wave of colonial revival architecture in Charlottesville was domestic, by the 1930s the style extended to the city's institutional core. The post office, now the downtown public library, was opened in 1936 boasting a brick body and a monumental portico of white columns (Figure 2, number 16; Figure 18). Two years later, the courthouse was extensively remodeled to its current colonial revival appearance (Figure 19). In a 1930s postcard of downtown Charlottesville, the photographer uses the bright red brick and stark white trim of the new colonial revival Albemarle county office buildings and courthouse as a suitable backdrop for the Jackson monument (Figure 20). In this one image, the monument and the architecture work in concert to reinforce the city's institutional and structural commitment to a political hierarchy of race. And finally, in 1939, the superintendent of schools opened Lane High School, a colonial revival structure once again, looming high above the Vinegar Hill neighborhood (Figure 2, number 17; Figure 21). The colonial revival remaking of Charlottesville was emblematic of a public program of political disenfranchisement, the crowning achievement of a campaign that had been underway for decades. Lane High School now serves as the Albemarle County Office Building.

African Americans in early twentieth-century Charlottesville traversed a city that reminded them of their second-class status at every turn.[54] Some had once lived in tenements on McKee's Row, but by the 1920s these had been demolished and replaced by a monument to Stonewall Jackson fronted by strong Aryan youth. Those who worked as janitors or other hourly-wage positions at the University passed by the George Rogers Clark statue and the new University hospital,

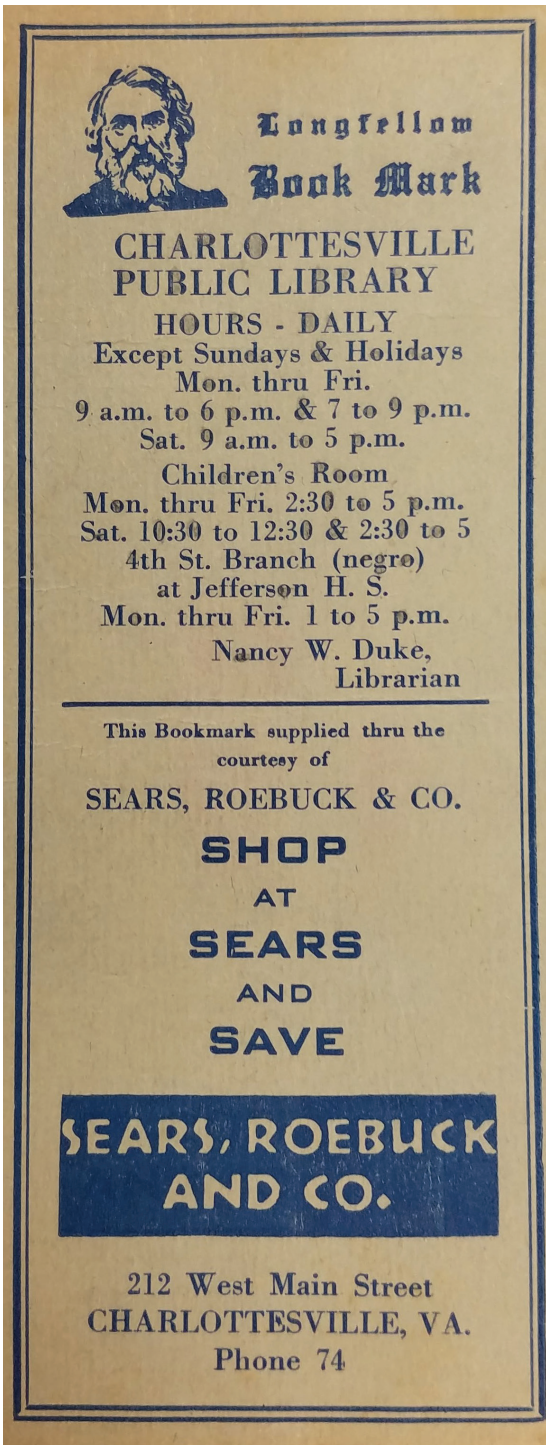

Figure 17. Charlottesville Public Library bookmark, 1940s, Charlottesville Public Library Collections, Charlottesville, Va. Note that the 4th Street Branch is marked (negro).

Figure 18. "Post Office, Charlottesville, Virginia." Postcard, 1930–45. Tichnor Brothers Postcard Collection, Boston Public Library.

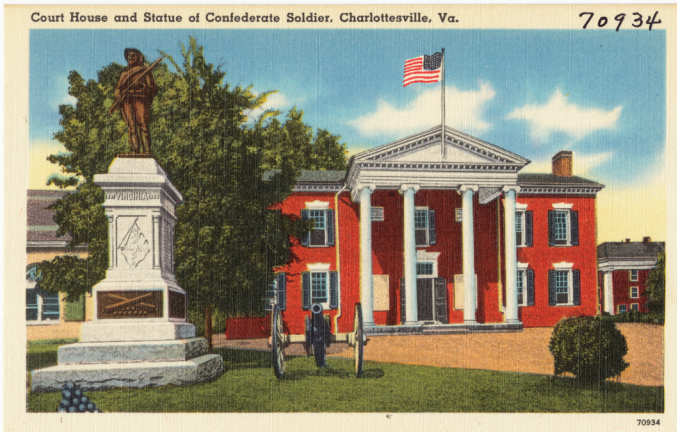

Figure 19. "Court House and Statue of Confederate Soldier, Charlottesville, Va." Postcard, 1930–45. Tichnor Brothers Postcard Collection, Boston Public Library.

Figure 20. "Stonewall Jackson Monument Showing Albemarle County Office Buildings and Court House." Postcard, 1930–45. Tichnor Brothers Postcard Collection, Boston Public Library.

both of which communicated a strong message of the inherent superiority and inevitable authority of whites. When they walked back to their home in Vinegar Hill they passed under the eager gaze of courageous discovery by Lewis and Clark and were reminded that such inquiry was in the realm of the white intellect. This was why there was a white high school but not a black one. And if they continued down Main Street and proceeded up Second Street they would enter the sacred precinct of Lee Square, the public library, the post office, and the court house that all reminded them that Charlottesville was a city blessed with a glorious past, but one with no room for black citizens.

And these objects newly installed in the cityscape were directly correlated with a series of urban performances by whites that reinforced a clear racial hierarchy. Many of these performances appear to have had an intentional audience: the African Americans who lived in Vinegar Hill. The parade celebrating the unveiling of the Jackson monument ended in a living Confederate banner in Midway Plaza, immediately above their neighborhood. The 1924 KKK parade celebrating the unveiling of the Lee statue began at the C&O Station and ended "at the foot of Vinegar Hill." White school children spent Halloween running through that same neighborhood dressed in the white robes of the KKK. And, finally, the city school board built a colonial revival high school on a high hill looming over Vinegar Hill, a neighborhood that by 1939 was flanked by two monumental white high schools.

This is not to say that Charlottesville's African American community did not resist these impositions. They organized a chapter of the NAACP. They registered to vote. They argued for equal access to education. But to no avail. By the late 1920s, Charlottesville's white establishment had cemented their victory through the erection of a series of monuments and buildings that became surrogates for the white hoods and torches of the lynch mob. For African Americans, these were all part and parcel of the same cityscape, one of diminishment, degradation, and disenfranchisement. These four monuments are the material legacy of a comprehensive and very successful campaign of racial intimidation; while the white population in Charlottesville/Albemarle grew by an astonishing 45 percent between 1900 and 1930, the African American population shrank by 20 percent.[55]

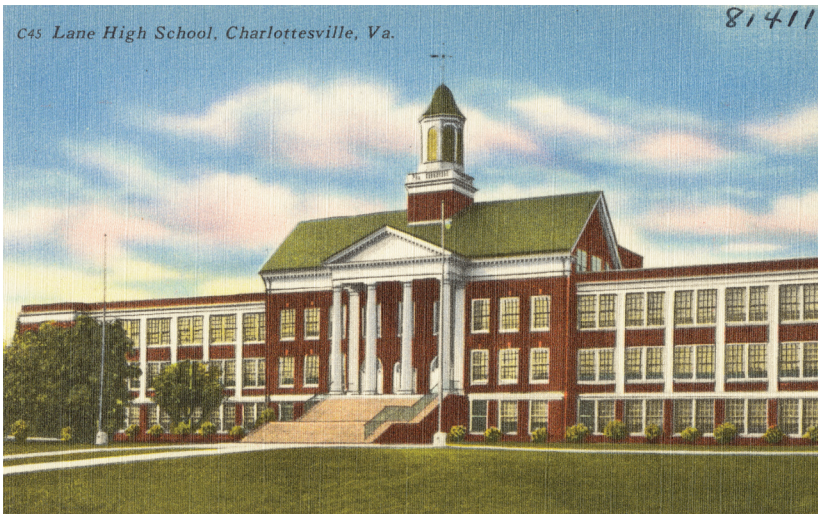

Figure 21. "Lane High School, Charlottesville, Va." Postcard, 1930–45. Tichnor Brothers Postcard Collection, Boston Public Library.

Through the summer of 2017, Charlottesville once again witnessed the public display of white supremacy in its streets and squares. In response to the proposed removal of the monument to the patriarch of the Confederacy, two white nationalists—both UVA alumni—began planning a massive "invasion" of the city, with now infamous results. The conflict centered on the renamed Lee Park, dominated by the Lee statue. David Duke was interviewed with the unshrouded Lee rising behind him. Private militias marched down Market Street, passing right in front of the former post office. An armed protester fired his gun in the square just yards from where a Presbyterian minister had once praised the charm of the Old South. The start of the 1924 KKK march was not far from the spots where DeAndre Harris was beaten and Heather Heyer was killed one century later. But as is very clear to all involved, these events were not really about the removal of a statue. In both events—in 1917 and in 2017—the intention was to enlist public space to explicitly assert white racial authority. In Charlottesville, the more obvious target was African Americans, but the KKK made clear their disdain for Jews and many others not like themselves. And while Charlottesville has now become synonymous with August 12, this is not a Southern story but a national condition. The deep legacies of exclusion and marginalization for some and preference and access for others are inscribed in the forms and names of buildings, bridges, sports teams, highways, parks, and statues across the Land of the Free. These historical legacies are not inert. Building on a long tradition, militias poured into the city last August equipped with shields and weapons because the removal of a monument signaled the potential destabilizing of the systems and structures that the statue had long represented: white supremacy.

AUTHOR BIOGRAPHY

Louis P. Nelson is professor of architectural history and Vice Provost for Academic Outreach at the University of Virginia.

NOTES

The author is grateful to the following readers who offered feedback on early drafts of this article: Lisa Goff, Andrus Ashoo, Bill Wilder, Ian Stevenson, Marta Gutman, Claudrena Harold, and Dell Upton. Some portions of this article were previously published in the introductory essay in Louis P. Nelson and Claudrena Harold, eds. Charlottesville 2017: The Legacy of Race and Inequity (UVA Press, 2018).

1. This essay depends heavily on the excellent historical research published as "1917–1924: A Timeline; The McIntire Statues and Charlottesville's African American Community," an appendix to the report of the Mayor's Blue Ribbon Commission on Race, Memorials, and Public Spaces. A deeper dive into the contexts outlined in this essay appears also in the rich online project The Illusion of Progress: Charlottesville's Roots in White Supremacy, available on the website of UVA's Carter G. Woodson Center: http://woodson.as.virginia.edu/woodson-projects.

2. Daily Progress, April 17, 1917.

3. Daily Progress, June 20, 1917.

4. Jeff Ueland and Barney Warf, "Racialized Topographies: Altitude and Race in Southern Cities," Geographical Review 96, no. 1 (January 2006): 50–78. The analysis of urban lowlands is also the subject of current research by Steven Moga at Smith College.

5. For more on the history of the patrons or artists see Aaron V. Wunsch, "From Private Privilege to Public Place: A Brief History of Parks and Park Planning in Charlottesville," The Magazine of Albemarle County History 56 (1998): 80–90.

6. For a broader view of these kinds of monuments across the South, see Kirk Savage, ed., The Civil War in Art and Memory (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2016).

7. This section draws from research already published by Daniel Bluestone, "A Virginia Courthouse Square," Buildings, Landscapes, and Memory: Case Studies in Historic Preservation (New York: Norton, 2011), 220–26 and Daily Progress, March 19, 1914.

8. Daily Progress, March 19, 1914.

9. Daily Progress, October 19, 1921.

10. For more on the particular authority of courthouses in early Virginia see Carl Lounsbury, The Courthouses of Early Virginia (Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 2005).

11. Kirk Savage, The Civil War in Art and Memory, 2.

12. Dell Upton, What Can and Can't Be Said (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2015), 33.

13. Linda Gordon, The Second Coming of the KKK: The Ku Klux Klan of the 1920s and the American Political Tradition (New York: Liveright, 2017).

14. Founded in 1909, the NAACP was at this point a fairly young organization. Blue Ribbon Commission Report, 16.

15. Daily Progress, October 1, 1920.

16. Daily Progress, February 16, 1921.

17. Daily Progress, February 19, 1921.

18. Daily Progress, July 19, 1921.

19. For more on the activity of the KKK in Charlottesville in the 1920s and 1930s, see "Chapter 1: Charlottesville's Confederate Past," from The Illusion of Progress, http://illusion.woodson.as.virginia.edu/index.html.

20. Daily Progress, November 3, 1921.

21. Alumni News 10 (1921): 326.

22. Alumni News 10 (1921): 326.

23. Gregory Dorr, "Segregation's Science: The American Eugenics Movement and Virginia, 1900–1980," PhD diss., University of Virginia, 2000.

24. Paul Barringer, The American Negro: His Past and Future (Raleigh, N.C.: Edwards and Broughton, 1900), 1.

25. The Colored American, March 3, 1900.

26. Daily Progress, August 23, 1922.

27. Daily Progress, April 6, 1924.

28. For more on the Progressive Era in Charlottesville, see "Chapter 3: The Progressive Era and the Enforcement of Racial Difference," from The Illusion of Progress, http://illusion.woodson.as.virginia.edu/index.html.

29. The most thorough discussion of racialized education in early Charlottesville is Scot French, "African American Civic Activism & the Making of Jefferson High School," in Andrea Douglas, ed., Pride Overcomes Prejudice: A History of Charlottesville's African American School (Charlottesville, Va.: Jefferson School African American Heritage Center, 2013), 41.

30. French, "African American Civic Activism," 31, 44.

31. French, "African American Civic Activism," 59.

32. French, "African American Civic Activism," 48.

33. Daily Progress, November 1, 1916.

34. French, "African American Civic Activism," 52.

35. French, "African American Civic Activism," 60.

36. Daily Progress, May 19, 1924.

37. Daily Progress, May 15, 1924.

38. Daily Progress, May 21, 1924.

39. A few decades later the church moved to a new site on Park Street. The original site is now a parking lot. Daily Progress, January 21, 1924.

40. Cited in Kirk Savage, Standing Soldiers, Kneeling Slaves: Race, War, and Monument in Nineteenth-Century America (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1997), 151

41. Nancy Bishop Dessommes, "Hollywood in Hoods: The Portrayal of the Ku Klux Klan in Popular Film," Journal of Popular Culture 32, no. 4 (March 1999): 13–22.

42. Daily Progress, January 25, 1924.

43. Daily Progress, January 25, 1924.

44. Daily Progress, February 1, 1924.

45. Daily Progress, June 21, 1924.

46. On the colonial revival, see Richard Wilson, "What Is the Colonial Revival?" in Richard Guy Wilson, Shaun Eyring, and Kenny Marotta, eds. Re-creating the American Past: Essays on the Colonial Revival (Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 2006). For a deeply contextual reading of the colonial revival, see Lydia Mattice Brandt, First in the Homes of His Countrymen: George Washington's Mount Vernon in the American Imagination (Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 2016).

47. "Minutes of the Board of Managers, Charlottesville Public Library," July 9, 1923, Jefferson-Madison Regional Library, Charlottesville Virginia.

48. "Minutes of the Board of Managers, Charlottesville Public Library," May 23, 1921, Jefferson-Madison Regional Library, Charlottesville Virginia.

49. "Minutes of the Board of Managers, Charlottesville Public Library," April 13, 1934, Jefferson-Madison Regional Library, Charlottesville Virginia.

50. "Minutes of the Board of Managers, Charlottesville Public Library," January 12, 1934, Jefferson-Madison Regional Library, Charlottesville Virginia.

51. "Minutes of the Board of Managers, Charlottesville Public Library," September 14, 1934, Jefferson-Madison Regional Library, Charlottesville Virginia.

52. Quoted in William B. Rhoads, "The Colonial Revival and the Americanization of Immigrants" from Alan Axelrod, ed., The Colonial Revival in America (New York: Norton, 1985), 348–49.

53. For an argument about the racialized nature of the colonial revival see Catherine W. Bishir, "Landmarks of Power: Building a Southern Past, 1885–1915," in Southern Built: American Architecture, Regional Practice (Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 2013).

54. On the realities of racism and walking in more recent times, see Garnette Cadogan, "Walking While Black: Garnette Cadogan on the Realities of Being Black in America," Literary Hub, July 8, 2016 [republished in Jesmyn Ward, ed., The Fire This Time: A New Generation Speaks about Race (New York: Scribner, 2016).

55. US Census Bureau Archives online: www.census.gov/prod/www/decennial.html.

Copyright of Buildings & Landscapes is the property of University of Minnesota Press and its content may not be copied or emailed to multiple sites or posted to a listserv without the copyright holder's express written permission. However, users may print, download, or email articles for individual use.